

Not much fun in playing the plane when a will be shot down like a rabbit if he stops playing for a single moment. We doubt if playing for a single moment. We doubt if the vilinin is putiling much expression into whatever tune he is playing, although every as he revolves. This is a little stunt that little note may have a sinister meaning of few music tenchers impart to their pupils. It is useful to Desmond, however.

As the piano stool whirls upward, Deamond

Desmond is a wonder. He knows that the single fouch on the wrong key will bring a gone into the next room, the villain puts a comes within reaching distance of the hamheavy hammer ker-plunk down on your head.
However, Deamond has no choice, since he rapidly, the resourceful scoundred makes the playing the plane with one's back to it, playing the plane with the feet is a comparatively rare accomplishment, sithough, it must be confessed, many a musical person believes their planed and person believes their produces a fair imitation of Desmond's playing with their feet.

Claude luils himself into false accurity in the next room. Hearing the sound of the plane, and as the bird pecks at the seeds it produces a fair imitation of Desmond's playing about his own destruction. Als, planed and yet he must do a rapid getaway. Seeds that he scattered on the keys of the plane in that he scattered on the level in that he scattered on the plane in that

"I'm the boy!" cries Desperate Desmond melody, Desmond crawls out of the tent, "and this here's my camel." The villain is while the heroic, but not quite so angacious, riding to attack the tent in which Claude and
