Desperate Desmond

It's All Right to Have Plenty of Sand, but Inconvenient to Have to Breathe It

Copyright, 1911, National News Association.

By Hershfield

In the dugout they have made in the sand, Claude and Rosamond prepare to sell their lives dearly, as they see the relentless Desmond approaching. A dugout is not the most comfortable place in the world, resembling a flat only in size and being entirely lacking in such conveniences as cold and less cold water, janitor, dumb waiter and not dumb neighbors. However, it is the best Claude can do in the circumstances.

Now approaches the resourceful, if wicked, Desmond, who has with him one of the powerful sweepers used by the Tripoli municipality for clearing the streets of the sand which blows in from the desert. Our street cleaning commissioners have their troubles with snow, but that's only at a very limited time of year. What would they do if they had to cope with a perpetual plague of sand? We confess that we give up the problem.

But it was for no peaceful, street-cleaning purpose that Desmond has employed the Tripoli sweeper. You see his full design as the huge machine begins to circle the dug-out, and at every revolution of the great brush sends a shower of sand flying over Claude and Rosamond. Everybody knows how uncomfortable it is to get sand down one's neck, but Desmond has an even worse purpose than making the lovers merely uncomfortable.

As the sand swirls around the dugout it gradually piles up around the doomed lovers until it forms a large cone which completely hides them from sight. Desmond, that fiend in more or less human form, chuckles as he thinks of the way in which he has ended the heroic career of Claude Eclaire, the gallant lover of the beautiful Rosamond. Ah well, we must all meet our fate sooner or later, and lucky if a tear is shed in our memory.

Hurray! The lovers are not dead, after all. (Perhaps you suspected they would find some means of escape.) The sand has drifted around a corner of their dugout, and although shut out from the light of day the two brave souls have not lost courage. They determine to send a message to the outside world by means of the active ants which haunt the sand. Never despair; don't give up the ship; while there's life there's something doing—such are Claude's mottoes.

A team of ants, harnessed together with thread, are now scuttling across the desert sands towing behind them a message to the world asking aid for the entombed lovers. Little dee the black-hearted Desmond guess that Claude has any means of summoning aid. The villain is overconfident, and this may lead to a complete overthrow of his plans. It never does to take too much for granted. To-morrow we may see the villain's doom.
