

Desperate Desmond

Music Soothes the Savage Breast and Also Halts the Marines Chasing the Villain

By Hershfield

Copyright, 1911, National News Association.

Away through the straight streets of Tripoli dashes Desperate Desmond, bearing with him the beautiful Rosamond, Claude and the men from the American man-of-war, having learned Desmond's plan from the Consul, start in hot pursuit. It will be a bad day for the renegade, Desmond, if the men from his home country ever get hold of him, and well the international crook knows it.

As Desmond, in his wild flight with Rosamond, rushes through Tripoli, he sees a native band stand. For some reason or other this gives him hope, although we cannot see why it should, unless he thinks the music will be enough to knock down his pursuers, unused to the Tripolitan execution. Or, perhaps, he thinks Rosamond's sensitive ear will be terribly tortured by it.

Hurriedly the villain approaches the leader of the band and asks him if his men will strike up the American national anthem when given the signal. The provident leader replies that they certainly will, in consideration of a small honorarium, which, of course, is quite different from a tip. Even now we cannot see why Desmond should have waited precious moments arranging for a tune.

And the villain wasted too many. The sailors and Claude have overtaken him and even now their guns are pointed at the scoundrel, who has no chance of escape. Rosamond breathes freely again, and Claude is happy once more in the prospect of freeing her. As for the villain, he looks anxiously toward the band stand, as if he expected some aid from that quarter.

Now the band strikes up. With a start Claude and the men from the ship recognize the strains of the "Star-Spangled Banner." With automatic precision they all come to the salute on hearing the national anthem. With a sneer upon his villainous features, Desmond again bears Rosamond away, relying upon the iron discipline of the men to save him from a volley that would end his career.

"I'm the boy!" cries Desperate Desmond, "and I can pedal for six days." With Rosamond before him on a bicycle, he wheels rapidly through the streets in which there is just room for them to pass. The villain knows that the marines must follow in single file, and that he cannot be surrounded by the detachment. See the pictures of the chase to-morrow.
