

Don Frijole, the dreaded Spanish bandit, has the unfortunate Desmond in his power, and Desmond is quick to realize his chance of getting possession of the girl. Producing his check book he quickly makes one in favor of the brigand and Desmond is handed over to the scoundrel, whose scheming has separated her from her heroic lover, Claude. Frijole, however, cannot let sentiment interfere with business.

Here is a fine position for a trusting brigand. Frijole attempts to cash the check Desmond has given him and is promptly told by the official that the paper is worthless. Desmond has put one over on the fellow brigand. Claude, who has hoped to raise a loan, comes into the bank and encounters the brigand. Their mutual hatred of Desmond gives them a bond of interest and they resolve to pursue the villain.

Making a desperate effort to catch the steamer for Gibraltar, Frijole and Claude dash madly down the pier from which the vessel is sailing. But alas! the ship has just cast off and is slowly making her way out into the harbor. Too late! and the villain Desmond is aboard with Frijole, laughing at the futile attempts of his pursuers to catch the ship. Villainy has once more triumphed over virtue.

To the intense surprise of Claude and his side-partner, Don Frijole, the pier suddenly begins to move through the water. They cannot understand the cause for this, but soon they learn that the pair are greatly pleased, and are content to take what happens as a gift of fate. Aboard the ship there is equal surprise. For it is not often that a flighty party takes it into its head to sail after a departing vessel.

Below the water we see the explanation of the pier's strange action. A diver has been sent down to search for a pocket-book which some woman passenger thought she had dropped overboard. And with the diver is a case of out of sight, out of mind. The crew forgets him and when the steamer moves out it pulls the flimsy pier along with it. Thus a seeming miracle is very simply explained.

"I'm the boy!" cries Desperate Desmond, "but I haven't the strength of Gibraltar." The villain is a prisoner in the hands of Claude, and when the ship reaches Gibraltar he will be turned over to the military officials, who may be expected to give him a short shift. It is a happy moment for the lovers when the great rock appears above the horizon. What happens at Gibraltar will be shown tomorrow.
