

draws near to the Rock of Gibralter. Claude and Resamond rejoice to think that in a few minutes more the scoundrel will be in the hands of the garrison, where he will be treated with military Gibralter has seen many crooks, but no rock scorpion ever equalled Desmand in utter villainly or lish soldiers are waiting on the top of the rick to pull the scoundrel off the steamer. A Tommy Atkins lowers a rope, and when Desmond is tied fast begins to haul him up. It does not look as if any more or less slow-thinking English soldiers could cope with the quick-witted villain, even if the latter is bound. But numbers are likely to tell.

Gibralter is a great place for Chef's tourists. Being the gate of the Mediterrarean, all the personally conducteds stop there to look over the rock. So it happens that a number of Americanswho are seeing Europe first-observe Desmond in the power of the English soldiers, and on the principle of my countryman, right or wrong, they deter-mine to aid Desmond, and to see at least that he gets a regular trial.

So tust as Desmond is about to be hauled into the hands of the soldiers, he feels the coils of a lariat settle around him in regular frontier style, and the villain knows that he now stands some slight chance of escape from military pustice. It is too bid that the tourists do not know Desmond's true characttr, but to them he is merely an unfortunate contest such as that old promotory has never seen before. The English soldiers on one rope, the tourists on another, enguge in a terrific tug-of-war for the possession of Desmond. If Desmond does not crack under the strain the pull should show which nation is superior. If Desmond does stretch, the ends of justice will be satisfied in any case. So pull,

"I'm the boy!" cries Desperate Des-mond, "but I feel like a Christmas eracker." From the deck of the steamer Don Frijole, Claude and Rosamond breathlessly watch the struggle. Claude, of course, cannot aid Desmond, and yet he will not assist the English soldiers against the American tourists. So he has simply to abide the result. For the story of this extraordinary struggle you must see to-morrow's pictures.
