Desperate Desmond

Saved by a Chance for Picture Postals, the Villain Plots Mischief Anew

Copyright, 1911, National News Association

By Hershfield

Up on the top of Gibraltar's great rock a strange struggle is taking place. American tourists, ignorant of Desmond's criminal career, are endeavoring in a wild tug of war to rescue him from the soldiers of the British garrison. Far below Claude and Rosamond, to say nothing of the vengeful Don Frijole, watch the contest from their steamer. All three have cause for wishing Desmond to meet military justice.

Just as the struggle at its maximum point there comes an interruption. The tourists, intent upon the struggle in hand, have not been looking about them, but the guide, ever anxious to point out the sights, has observed a yacht passing. He does not know what yacht it is, any more than you or I might have known, but he instantly calls his charges to look at King George's steamer returning from the Indian Durbar.

Zing! Every tourist lets go the rope, and the soldiers, suddenly released, go toppling backwards over the cliff, dragging Desmond along. Not that the tourists care much for a king as a king, but it is not every day that one gets a chance to take a snapshot of a real live monarch, and a monarch certainly makes a grand postal card, even if he isn't good for anything else. So Desmond is entirely forgotten.

Although hurtling through the air over the side of the great rock, Desmond does not lose his presence of mind. Everybody might learn a lesson from the scoundrel in this respect. It is foolish to get flustered, no matter what happens. So Desmond, while falling apparently to certain death, notices that the powder from a saluting gun has burned the rope that bound him to the soldiers. We hope they fell in a soft spot, but don't know.

With the quickness of a cat, the villain catches his feet in the muzzle of the still smoking gun and hangs there for a moment. He knows that he has but a few seconds, for the next salute that is fired will blow his feet out. However, he has observed that the royal yacht is below him and he trusts that if he drops on the awnings he will bounce unhurt into the water. Risky, but the only chance he has left.

Desmond's plan was successful. He has dropped into the water and is now close beside the steamer, where Claude and Rosamond are watching the king. Perhaps the king has heard of Claude's heroism and Rosamond's adventures and is waving his sympathy to them. It is quite likely. Don Frijole, the bandit, also regards the king intently. But Frijole is thinking what a ransom he would bring. For Desmond's plot see tomorrow's pictures.
