

Again the villain Deemond is in the hands of the Spanlards, who are more determined than ever to end his black career forever. First, though, they decide to take him before King Alfonso, who is naturally curious to see the international crook, and accordingly Desmond is led into the throne room, where Alfonso sits, robed and crowned. As the scoundrel advances up the steps of the throne, Alfonso reminds him they have many uppleasant ways of dealing with such characters, but the villain even goes so far as to threaten the king in his own palace

This is enough for Alfonso. His royal pride will allow him to hear no more and, heides, who knows that his life is safe with such a resourceful and un-scrupulous scoundrel in such close proximity? So the king works the famous collapsible stairs, first placed in the palace by Charles V. for use in just such emergencies, and sang? Desmond goes flippity-flog down the tobogram silde, along with a heiter-skelter of courtiers, guards, heroes, Claudes and Rosamonds. 'Tis a merry jest on the king's part, and the monarch laughs right merrily as his subjects turn involuntary flip-flops. A rare prank, in sooth!

However, the old saw applies to kings as well as to churls-he laughs best who laughs last. Even in this mix-up Desmond is not confused. He seizes Rosa-mond and forces her from the throne room. On the way he swipes Alfonso's second best crown and puts it on his head. And, say what you like, a crown is a potent thing. People will bow before a vacant head that bears a crown when they will laugh at intellect in a shabby hat. Be that as it may, Desmond passes the guards, put Rosamond aboard a dirigible, and is away. Claude is select, suspected of being in a plot with Desmond. His examination will be shown tomorrow.
