

GOOD books go into good homes, but they cannot long remain there unless they are placed in cases that protect them from dust and damaging knocks.

Bookcases of this kind are made by good workmen with an honest purpose. They lack none of the essentials of good furniture.

The modern home substitutes the old-fashioned case for the sectional, just as modern industry throws aside obsolete equipment for the more progressive products of the age.

For the home of few books three or four sections will suffice now, and these may be added to as the books increase.
