

Desperate Desmond

The Villain Becomes an Unwilling Sandwichman and Winds Up in the Wrong Shop

By Hershfield

Copyright, 1931, National News Ass'n.

Blinded by the paste and hampered by the bucket which Claude threw over the wall on Desmond's head, the villain, nevertheless makes shift to run. Claude's sacrifice of the pot of paste was justified by the way it baffled Desmond of his prey, and again brought the lovers together. In the joy of meeting Claude does not secure Desmond, but the villain can't run far thus hampered.

As Desmond, having shaken off the bucket, runs blindly through the streets he blunders into an exciting political meeting of the Manchurian party. The thick paste over the villain's head prevents him from seeing anything, but he hears the hot party speech being delivered by the speaker, who seems destined to succeed the highbinder as the main factor in Chinese politics since the revolution began.

In true western style, the Chinese orator, after likening his candidate to the sun, the moon and the stars for splendor, the lily for purity and the serpent for wisdom, proceeds to scatter handbills bearing the name of his Oriental paragon. "Take these home," he says, "and paste them on the wall as a reminder to vote for the only man who can save the Chinese republic. Vote for T. H. Chee and lower cost of living."

Now as Desmond, thickly covered with paste, rushes wildly forward, the handbills fluttering through the air fall lightly upon him and where they touch they stick. So that the villain is quickly transformed into a remarkably striking sandwichman, whose mad antics would compel any crowd to look at him and read the advertising matter he thus strangely carried around with him. But Desmond continued his rush.

Now doubly blinded by the thick paste and the hand bills which are sticking to it, Desmond blunders through the narrow streets. He feels his way to a large doorway, and expecting to find a store, he thinks that he will soon be relieved of this incubus of paste and paper. But this is no store, as you will see by reading the name over the door. Desmond is about to make a sad blunder.

Sure enough, Desmond has made a fatal mistake. Covered over with posters advertising a Manchurian candidate, he has entered the headquarters of the opposition revolutionary party, and the members are quick to seize the scoundrel and make him a prisoner just as Claude and Rosamond rush up. The work has been taken off our hero's hands, and tomorrow we shall see Desmond's fate.
