

Desperate Desmond

Like Bruce's Spider, All Heroic Claude Can Do Is Try, Try Again.

By Henshfield

Claude's strong arm puts an end to Desmond's bicycling career on the wall. The hero, after vaulting to the top, sees the villain and chucks him over the wall, on the outside of which Claude himself so lately stood. Once more Rosamond has been freed from the machinations of the scoundrel Desmond, and Claude is at last triumphant.

But Desmond is still to be reckoned with. Sign painters are busy upon the outside of the wall, and their movable scaffold is just below the spot where Desmond has been thrown over. The villain's proverbial luck stands by him to the last, and here he finds a nice platform all ready for him to land upon. You can't throw this bad man down.

Far above on the top of the wall Claude and his beautiful Rosamond have set Desmond's bicycle, and thinking that the scoundrel is safely out of the way forever, are riding around the city in the hope of finding friendly shelter with some educated Chinese. They are far from home, but they are happy even to be together here.

Desmond, however, is far from dead. Instead he is up on the sign painter's movable scaffold, which the Chinese spurred on by his offer of 5 yen, are racing around the wall as fast as Claude can push along his bicycle on the precarious track above. All unconscious of his danger, our hero is happily conversing with Rosamond.

Suddenly, as Claude is riding along with Rosamond, a hand comes up from the edge of the wall and seizes our hero in an iron grip. It is the cruel Desmond who has just captured Claude and once more spoiled his visions of happiness with Rosamond. Desmond has no mercy; he is a villain through and through, a disgrace to humanity.

"I'm the boy!" cries Desperate Desmond, "and I'm on the top this time." Our hero is again at the foot of the wall, while his enemy Desmond and his blessed demsel look down from the high wall of Pekin. Tomorrow we shall see Claude emulate Bruce's spider and try to climb again. Let us hope he will eventually succeed.
