Desperate Desmond

Seems to Be Quite a Run on the Dental Parlors Where the Villian Is Posing.

By Hershfield

I.—IN THE CHAIR OF PAIN.

No matter how much of a hero a man may be, he feels far from heroic in the dentist's chair. No man is a hero to his dentist. So think none the worse of Claude Eclaire when he adjures the dentist—who is, in truth, our old acquaintance, Desperate Desmond—to go easy with the electric drill. It merely shows Claude is human.

II.—BOUND AND GAGGED.

Beautiful Rosamond, Claude's sweetheart, has been bound and gagged by the villain and placed where she is compelled to hear her lover's cries while powerless to aid him in any way. To her great surprise she hears sounds of a terrific contest in the room above the dentist's office, but the noise prevents the people above from hearing her lover's cries.

III.—THE CONTEST.

In the room above a terrific struggle is taking place between two English pugilists, who have been brought over by some wealthy Russians anxious to adopt the worst customs of England. In the encounter one of the pugilists has his set of false teeth knocked out, and sadly he reflects that he has not won kopecks enough for another.

IV.—A SECOND STORY MAN.

Driven to desperation by the loss of his teeth, the defeated pugilist resolves to turn thief. Accordingly he shins down the rainpipe to the Moscow Dental Parlors, hoping to get in unobserved and help himself to a new set of molars. It is a terrible thing for a "sport" to do, but we must not blame him too much on account of his early training.

V.—RESCUE IN SIGHT.

To the rough pugilist, as he peers through the open window, the sight of the beautiful Rosamond, tightly bound, comes as a shock. Although he intended to purloin a set of teeth, the man's innate chivalry will not allow him to neglect the appeal of beauty in distress, and, at any risk to himself, he resolves to effect her release from Desmond.

VI.—UNMASKED.

"I'm the boyski!" cries Desperate Desmond, "and I made Claude howlski." The scoundrel is now unmasked and in the strong grasp of Claude and the repentant second story man. Claude's jaws are still sore from Desmond's treatment, but he manages to say grimly that the scoundrel shall be made to pay for his crimes. Tomorrow we shall see his fate.
