

Desperate Desmond

Claude's Kindness to a Young Stranger Has Surprising Results for Rosamond and Himself

By Hershfield

I.—TO THE CAZAR
Claude Eclair, peerless hero, and Rosamond, his beautiful sweetheart, are now being led to the presence of the czar, where the final sentence is to be pronounced upon them. It is a moment of cruel exultation for Desmond, who rejoices in the fate that is now sure to overtake the helpless lovers in the land of despotism and darkness.

II.—THE BRIDGE OF SIGHS
Across the Russian "Bridge of Sighs," over which so many unfortunate political prisoners have trod their sad way, Claude and Rosamond are now forced by Desmond and the Russian guard. It is a bridge on which the footsteps all point in one direction, for there is no return from the dread castle once the heavy doors have changed behind one.

III.—CHILDISH PLAY
What is this? Ah, a youngster at play, sliding down the wire supports of the bridge. All unconscious of his danger, the little boy shouts in childish play. But this is no ordinary little boy. As the observant reader has already spotted from the little crown on the boy's head, this youngster is the czarvitch, heir to the throne of the Little Father.

IV.—TO THE RESCUE
Claude's quick eye instantly sees the danger that waits for the boy as he slides. To Claude the czarvitch is the same as any other youngster. Our hero would risk his life as quickly to save the heir of the humblest peasant in all the Russia. He loses no time here, but with all his speed rushes forward to clutch the boy and prevent him from falling.

V.—SAVED
With practiced skill, Claude grasps the sliding boy in his powerful arms and by a terrific effort of strength and agility rushes up the heavy cable with the child safe and sound in his embrace. From the castle window the czarvitch watches in frantic fear, for her only son is the apple of her eye and the hope of the Romanoffs.

VI.—REWARD
"I'm the boy's!" cries Desperate Desmond, "but I'm in the soup!" The grateful czar is investing Claude with the Order of Krimchhook, and offers to have Desmond cast into a dungeon at the slightest suggestion from our hero. What befalls Claude and what befalls Desmond will be shown by the artist in tomorrow's exciting pictures.
