

Desperate Desmond

The Napoleon of Villains, as You See Below, Meets with a Truly Unexpected Waterloo

By Hershfield

I.—OUT OF THE BELL. II.—DRAGGED ALONG. III.—THE HAT OF THE EMPEROR. IV.—BORROWED PLUMES. V.—THE LAST SURVIVOR. VI.—IN FULL FLIGHT.

Having been accidentally discovered hiding inside the great bell of Moscow, Claude and Rosamond are now compelled to emerge from their retreat. Desmond who had been truly searching for the lovers, is overjoyed to discover them again and he promptly proceeds to make them once more his prisoners, being aided by Nihilists.

The heartless scoundrel now mounts a horse that he induced some poor soldier to part with at the risk of being court-martialed. Claude Rolette and the frail Rosamond are bound, and with a rope the villain intends to drag them along over the roughest country. Desmond has not the least pity for the heroine.

On the route taken by Napoleon when he left Moscow on his awful retreat in 1812, some workmen are digging. Suddenly one of them uncovers a hat. It is no other than Napoleon's, the great Napoleon's. From his head it must have blown off when his great army began that terrible march on conquered but conquering Moscow.

Desperate Desmond, the great international crook, notices the find of Napoleon's hat. With pride in his own notoriety as the Napoleon of villains, the scoundrel purchases the relic and at once claps it upon his own head. Like many successful villains, Desmond is simply checkbook with vanity exaggerated.

Now, upon the scene comes a very old man, the oldest man in Russia. As a boy this man had been one of the Russians that made so disastrous the great Emperor's retreat from their beloved city of Moscow. He now thinks that he has before him the Little Corporal himself, and old hatreds spring anew.

"The boyaki!" cries Desperate Desmond, "but I must shriek!" The veteran of 1812 has proved too much for the Napoleon of villains, as he did for the earlier Napoleon. Once again Claude and Rosamond are together and the villain in full flight. Tomorrow we shall see what fate befalls him.
