Desperate Desmond

Even the Birds of the Air Fight Against the Great International Crook

By Hershfield

I—THE DEADLY WEB.

Like a terrible spider in the midst of its web, Desperate Desmond reclines in his hammock among the leaves. Bombs are scattered all around the tree and from each a long fuse runs right to Desmond's hand, so that approaching enemies can easily be blown sky high before they get a chance to grapple with the international crook.

II—RECONNOITERING.

Claude Eclaire has not given up hope of rescuing his beloved Rosamond. Through powerful binoculars he spies out Desmond's position, and sees that it is impossible to fire a volley at the scoundrel lest Rosamond be wounded. It is plain to one of Claude's penetrating intellect that a means must be found to cut the fuses and thus baffle Desmond.

III—THE WINGS OF A BIRD.

Claude's observation of nature now stands him in good stead. He has frequently observed that a bird, before roosting in a tree, will fly around it several times, as if to see that all is safe. The party now captures a bird, and Claude holds it gently while a sharp knife is tied to it. On this bird depends, perhaps, the very life of Rosamond.

IV—CUTTING THE FUSES.

The bird, as soon as released, flies straight for the tree in which the scoundrel Desmond is concealing himself. As the feathered messenger skims around the tree the sharp knife which the besiegers attached to it severs the thin fuses of the bombs upon which the villain relied to keep his foes at a safe distance from his leafy retreat.

V—A TRAPPED VILLAIN.

With the bombs thus rendered harmless, it is an easy matter for Claude Eclaire and the Russian police to rush in and force the scoundrel to descend from his perch. Desmond is now in the hands of his relentless enemies and some terrible fate will be meted out to him by the Russian authorities, who have waited their chance.

VI—BENEATH THE BATTLESHIP.

"I'm the boyski!" cries Desperate Desmond, "but I'll soon be a rotypolyvitch." The villain is placed under the keel of a new Russian battleship about to be launched by the czar, and as soon as the great hull begins to glide into the water, good-bye to the villain's life. Tomorrow's pictures will show the launching.
