Desperate Desmond

A Jewel from the Czar's Crown Precipitates a Rumpus That Saves the Villain

By Hershfield

I. WITH THE CZAR.

Claude Eclaire and Rosamond have now enlisted the powerful aid of the czar on their side. Nicholas is almost as anxious as Claude to capture the great international crook, who menaces his safety. Claude believes Desmond is hiding among the sailors, having obtained a uniform from some Russian seaman, who had deserted from his ship.

II. IN THE RANKS.

Sure enough Desmond is in the ranks of the sailors drawn up for inspection. There are many rows of men behind him, so he cannot bolt back, and in the meantime the czar and Claude are passing down one rank after another, closely scrutinizing each sailor as they pass. A few seconds more and the frightened villain must inevitably be discovered.

III. THE THEFT.

As the czar passes along the lines of sailors, his official crown glitters in the sun. The precious stones in it almost dazzle the eyes of the simple Russian seamen and one of the sailors is tempted beyond his strength. Just one of the diamonds so close to his hand would give him a competence, and so he reaches out with a quick grab for the stone.

IV. A MAD SCRAMBLE.

Feeling the tug at his crown, the czar takes it on the run for his palace, as he is not much of a scrapper. But there is a rough and tumble fight on the scene without the czar's assistance. The sailors at once break their ranks and engage in a mad scramble for the diamond picked out of the crown by the thieving Russian seadog.

V. THE VILLAIN ESCAPES.

As soon as the Russian sailors begin their tussle for the diamond, Desmond seizes the opportunity to make a break for liberty, and runs into the deserter who had taken his suit. As the deserter has been looking upon the vodka when it is—whatever color it is—Desmond has no difficulty in regaining his togs.

VI. IN THE PALACE OF THE KING.

"I'm the boyski!" cries Desperate Desmond, "and I could go a sandwitchovitch." The villain sees the shadows of Claude and Rosamond as they sit at the royal dinner table enjoying some of the imperial cavier. But hunger must be forgotten; Desmond has work to do. He must capture Rosamond. What his plan is will be disclosed tomorrow.
