

Desperate Desmond

How Our Characters Get Mixed Up with a Lot of Royalty, Spurious and Otherwise

By Hershfield

I.—THE TWO MONARCHS. Desperate Desmond, the international crook is disguised as the czar. The real czar, Nicholas, is having troubles of his own as the peasants who were aroused by the fake czar, are going after him hammer and tong. Needless to say, Desmond cares nothing for the fight, except in so far as he may utilize it to accomplish his nefarious purpose.

II.—IN THE MASQUERADER'S HANDS. Slipping quickly into the press of the fight, Desmond slides up to Claude and Rosamond and leads the beautiful girl away from her protector. Claude thinks the villain is taking him for the czar, about to conduct Rosamond to a place of safety. Even the beautiful girl herself is deceived as to the villain's identity and readily follows him from the fight.

III.—FACE TO FACE. As Desmond is congratulating himself on his escape with Desmond, he is suddenly brought up against a Russian official and is brought before Desmond. It is obvious, even to a Russian detective, that one of the two men in royal robes is an impostor, and a test is necessary to decide which.

IV.—ANOTHER IMPERSONATOR. One of the Russian officials actually gets an idea, a good one, too, for it will disclose the impostor without offending the real czar. No Russian official dare offend the czar in the slightest particular. Briefly the plan is to have a professional impersonator appear as the Emperor William. The fake czar would be deceived and welcome the impostor.

V.—THE THREE KINGS. Suddenly the scene is changed by the appearance of Kaiser Wilhelm, as it seems to the onlookers and Desmond. Trying to get away with it in an easy manner, the scoundrel hails the impersonator as his old pal, the German emperor. The real czar detects the disguise, however, and doesn't say a word while Desmond is giving himself away.

VI.—UNMASKED. "I'm the boys!" cries Desperate Desmond. "But those are not my whiskers." The villain is promptly unmasked by the impersonator, who reveals that he himself is also a mere masquerader. The real czar is vindicated, and Rosamond rushes away in horror from the scoundrel. How the czar deals with him will be shown tomorrow.
