

Desperate Desmond

A Spanish General Has a Long Trip for Nothing, but on the Other Hand Claude Escapes

Claude and the beautiful Rosamond are in the hands of the Cubans and are brought before the notorious General Weyler. (We know that this is Desmond in disguise, but the others don't.) Knowing Weyler's reputation, the Cubans have no hesitancy in turning the lovers over to him to undergo some cruel punishment.

Believing that he has the sole news of General Weyler's presence in Cuba, one of Claude's captors rushes to the cable station to flash the message to Spain. He addresses the cable to General Blanco, since the latter may return and aid in recapturing the island from the natives for Spain.

In a Spanish café General Blanco receives the surprising news that his colleague is in distant Cuba and that there is an excellent chance to regain the island for the Spanish flag. It is news that causes the general to leave his favorite café and prepare for a rush to Cuba.

Days later General Blanco's submarine comes to the surface near the Cuban coast. To the general's horror he is confronted by a body of American marines, not by a crowd of friendly rebels under Weyler. There is no chance of escape; the proud Castilian has to admit that he is bamboozled.

In revenge for the trick which he considers has been played upon him by Weyler, the disgruntled Spanish general leads the way toward an old haunt of the former commander in Cuba. He will turn Weyler over to the Americans to get square for the awful blow to his Spanish pride.

"I'm the boy!" cries Desperate Desmond, "but, thank goodness, I'm not Weyler." It takes Blanco but a moment to see through the villain's disguise, and it takes the marines little longer to capture the scoundrel. Claude and his Rosamond are free. Desmond's fate will be shown tomorrow.
