

Desperate Desmond

Over the Hurdles Fly Claude and Villain in Record-Smashing Race

By Hershfield

I.—THE START. At the crack of the pistol, Desperate Desmond and Claude Eclair are off in a hurdle race for the greatest prize ever at stake in such a contest. The winner is to receive liberty and the hand of Rosamond; the loser is to receive—death. No wonder the rivals strain from the start.

II.—THEY'RE OFF. Crack, goes the pistol. At a bound the rivals are in their stride, and, like swallows, both fly at the first hurdle side by side. Neither can gain an advantage. On the field Rosamond cheers Claude as he scoots along like a started rabbit. She, too, has much at stake in the race.

III.—PULLING AHEAD. For a few moments the race is even; then Claude's greater stamina tells. The villain's wind is falling. His habit of smoking cigarettes has harmed his lungs, and Desmond, despite his greatest efforts, is compelled to see the clean-living Claude gradually increasing his lead with every hurdle.

IV.—DANGER. As Claude Eclair flies along to what appears a certain victory, his eye is caught by the words, "Stop. Danger." In a moment he pulls up to investigate, and to his horror discovers that the sign is a part of an ad for some liniment. It is too late now to get back in his stride.

V.—THE VILLAIN LEADS. Profiting by Claude's sudden stop, the villain increases his speed and leaves her hero standing still. No hurdler that ever lived could catch Desmond with such an advantage, and Rosamond sees with horror that she must again fall into the power of the unscrupulous villain.

VI.—ABOARD THE SHIP. "The boy," cries Desperate Desmond, "and I have the girl aboard the lugger." The Cubans have set the villain free and put Rosamond aboard the ship going to Stockholm for the Olympic games. Claude is left on shore to meet a terrible fate. Tomorrow we shall show what happens.
