

Desperate Desmond

How the Savage Eskimo Dogs Hear Their Master's Voice Over the Long-Distance Telephone

By Hershfield

I—IN THE VILLAIN'S POWER. Desperate Desmond, the international crook, once again has the beautiful Rosamond in his power. Claude, Rosamond's lover and protector, has been left far behind, and the villain hopes to leave the girl locked up securely, while he goes to take part in the Olympic games. Desmond is vain of his athletic prowess, and wishes to pose.

II—THE HUNGRY PACK. In the meantime the unfortunate Claude is sorely put to it to save his life from the half savage pack of Eskimo dogs which Desmond and his allies have "picked" on him. Run as he may, our hero cannot shake off the hungry animals, and he knows that once he falls he will have no opportunity ever to rise again.

III—A FAINT HOPE. As our hero runs along in his desperate race, he sees a lineman busily at work repairing the telephone wires. This gives Claude a faint hope of escape. By climbing the pole he may elude the half-starved huskies that are pursuing him so relentlessly. Even then he will be held a prisoner and cannot aid his Rosamond.

IV—UP THE POLE. With a tremendous spring, Claude eludes the leading dogs and gains a position of comparative safety on the pole. Now he gets a better idea. If the lineman can connect with some explorer by using his pocket telephone, there may be some hope of getting away to aid Rosamond. It is a long chance, but the only one that presents itself to Claude.

V—THEIR MASTER'S VOICE. The friendly lineman has connected up his phone and got a celebrated explorer on the wire. The situation is explained to the explorer, who can hear for himself the wild howling of the savage dogs below the phone. He readily agrees to give the brutes some orders in Eskimo, and, behold, in a moment they are quiet.

VI—ON THE FIELD. With the dogs pacified for the moment at least, Claude is not slow to make his getaway and rush to the Olympic field. Desmond is already there, posing as a strong man, but Claude does not see him. Sooner or later, however, there is bound to be a clash, the result of which will be shown in tomorrow's pictures.
