Prominent Bankers Back the New Omaha State Bank

seven national banks, the Omaha State Bank, which is to be opened in the new State Bank Building now being erected under the name of the Oscar Keeline building at Seventeenth and Harney streets, will find a solid and sincere support awaiting it from this city, this state and the commonwealths bordering upon the boundaries of Nebraska. Omaha is a city that stands well toward the top among the cities of the country in bank clearings; it is a city that has fewer National banks than any other city of its size in the country. It is, therefore, a natural place for the founding of a new state bank of the enduring qualities that are possessed by the State Bank, which must be firm and stable in order to comply with the stringent clauses of the new Nebraska State Guaranty law.

The capitalization of the Omaha State Bank will be $300,000. The subscribers to this stock include many of the best known bankers and capitalists of Nebraska and Iowa. A glance at the list of subscribers which is published with this article will immediately give a true insight into the character and prominence of the men who have joined with the original stockholders to give Omaha another strong, safe bank, a bank of the kind that Omaha needs.

To Open October 1.

Present plans of the directors of the bank will permit the new institution to open for business about October 1, the exact date depending upon the completion of the State Bank building. This structure was begun by the Thomas Realty Co. with the intention of calling it the Oscar Keeline building. Then the Omaha State Bank decided to lease a large space on the lower floor, which includes the southwest corner, and Mr. Keeline changed the name of the building to the State Bank building. The new quarters of the bank will be fitted up to form one of the best appointed and handsomest banking institutions in Omaha or the state.

No president of the new bank has been elected yet, but at the next meeting of the board of directors this officer will be selected. Albert S. White, a banker of wide experience, and one of the progressive young men of the west, will be vice-president. J. L. Svoboda, present state bank examiner, will be cashier. The man who is to be president is said to be one of the best bankers in the state, and his name is not now mentioned because of his present connections. As soon as his election is completed, however, his name will be made public.

To show what others think of the new Omaha State Bank the following quotation is taken from an article which appeared in The Western Banker for July:

Prospects Held Excellent.

"The prospects of the Omaha State Bank are of the very best. Its board of directors will be composed of leading business men, and it will receive immediate support from the state at large and from western Iowa on account of the large circle of enterprising bankers whom the organizers have succeeded in interesting in the project. The marked success of state banks elsewhere is pointed to, especially the phenomenal growth of the Nebraska State Bank at Lincoln, which opened for business in January, 1911, with a capital of $50,000, and now has deposits of nearly $700,000, almost thirteen times the amount of its captial."

For banks strictly regulated as are banks under the new State Guaranty law of Nebraska there is much need today. When it is remembered that the banks of the United States have made twice as much growth during the last twenty years as in all the previous one hundred years of the country's existence it will be seen that business conditions of this prosperous country demand more banks of the nature of the Omaha State Bank. This rapid growth is a reflection of the rapid expansion of trade industry in the United States, and extraordinary transformation which has been steadily going on from individual and partnership to the corporation form of ownership of property.

New State Bank Building

In connection with these facts it is interesting to record that the Chicago banks last spring, for the first, were able to report deposits in excess of a thousand million dollars. Ten years ago the total was considerably less than half that. A single Chicago institution now controls deposits nearly equal to one-half the total deposits of a decade ago.

In forming a decision to organize the Omaha State Bank the leaders of the movement were swayed by the fact that many leading Omaha business men and many bankers throughout the west agree with them that this city offered a splen-

New Measure Helps.

Though some bankers find objections to the new Nebraska banking law because of the strictures that it places on the owners of the banks, the new measure is undoubtedly an excellent one, for it safeguards the deposits of the people, and that is what it was intended to do. It assures a safety on deposits in state banks that the former banking laws of the state did not give. The Oklahoma guaranty law, admittedly a good one, has been improved upon to a great degree through the Nebraska law, and many of the objectionable features of the first statute have been kept out of the Nebraska law.

Since the passage of the Guaranty Bank law in this state three years ago there have been no bank failures. The state has a rigid banking law providing for the supervision and regular examination of banks. The fact that in Nebraska property values and business conditions have became well established and settled, renders the selection of good loans less hazardous than in a new country like Oklahoma. Omaha had its boom period years ago, along with nearly every other western city and for many years now its growth has been slow, sure and substantial. As a railroad center, as a distributing point and as a business and financial center, few cities are its equal and few enjoy a greater degree of solid growth and prosperity.

No one doubts the future of Omaha; this city is growing every day and in every line. Its commercial club, one of the livest organizations of its kind in the country, is daily doing great things for this city. Industries are growing; new factories are coming to this city; railroads are expanding their freight and terminal facilities-everywhere there is sign of steady, substantial progress of the kind that makes a great future a certainty. A properly managed new bank in such a community is certain to meet with favor and to prove a paying investment to the stockholders.

Lincoln Bank an Example

An example of what a strong state bank can do is seen in the record of the Nebraska State Bank at Lincoln, an institution which opened its doors for business in January, 1911, with a capital of $50,-000. The last published statement of this bank, in June, 1912, showed deposits of $761,000, and the stock is reported as being held at $200 per share. While the phenomenal growth of this institution may be largely attributed to the personnel of its management the guaranty law undoubtedly has been a factor in the bank's success.

Records show that the average annual dividends paid by all the banks in the United States are a fraction more than 11 per cent, in addition to which the average bank annually places a certain per cent of its profits into the surplus account, thus increasing the value of the

In nearly every case Omaha banks have been good paying institutions. Exclusive of one bank on which figures were not obtainable, the average net earnings of Omaha banks in 1911 was 14.4 per cent, one bank reporting net profits of 29 per cent and another 26 per cent. In such a city there must be ample room for another strong bank.

Every Nebraska banker is agreed to this verdict. The Omaha State bank, under the wise management of its experienced banking heads, is sure to progress, even as the Nebraska State Bank at Lincoln has done, and perhaps with more rapid growth, because it is to be in a large city, where the business is greater and the opportunities more plentiful. The proposed capital is $300,000. The par value of shares is $100. The stock is offered at $125 per share, $100 to capital and $25 to create a surplus fund, less organization expense. It has been found profitable in recent years for new banks beginning business in large cities to start with a paid in surplus. That many Nebraska and Iowa bankers, business men and capitalists believe in the great future before the Omaha State Bank is proved by the following list of subscribers to stock in this new institution:
