Keeping Up With Wattville

him a little insensible to the march of events, desperately resolved on dignity and the guarded decorum which a man of the world should possess when slightly in danger.

When next his curiosity and appreciation of outward things had about returned, it was over a friendly steak, and Wattville was saying with a joviousness that brought to him a sense of mental fatigue:

"I can say honestly, my hand on my heart, that I take my life in the most serious way. I regard myself as a scientific experiment. I have set out to prove that the value of sleep to the human organization has been grossly exaggerated. I take three hours' sleep. I believe two to be sufficient, but I take three because I am very careful and very moderate. Every Tuesday I go without any sleep at all. I hope to prove, as soon as I can break down the amazing obstacles of centuries of tradition, that the human mind needs sleep as a relaxation only, once in forty-eight hours; and that, in the case of superior individuals, once in three days is quite sufficient."

A little later, it seemed to Stukey that he had been waffled down the stairs in the most delightful manner and propped in a gentle armchair before a window that framed the blurred and rapid passage of houses, fluttering hats, omnibuses, messenger boys with bundles, express wagons and top hats.

"Now, let's be sure your friend, Mr. Stukey, thoroughly understands," said the voice of Harrigan.

"His mind is like a steel trap. It seizes everything," said Wattville, in a rippling tone.

"It is a little game we call Nigger Up and Nigger Down," continued Harrigan, "a delightful little custom of the Club. You will like it. Luqueer and I will play against you two. For every gentleman of color who goes up Fifth avenue, one plunk to you; for every one that goes down, one plunk to us. Are the stakes agreeable?"

"Double 'em on principle."

"Double it is. If you get a funeral or a wedding you make a killing."

"Let 's begin."

"One more point—a little tradition of the Club. If a white dog with a natural tail passes through the churchyard opposite and continues uptown, ten plunks to you. If he goes down, ten to us."

"Charming," said Wattville.

"What's this about a natural tail?" said Stukey, suspiciously.

"A tail that hasn't been bit off, sawed off or broken off in any manner," said Luqueer. "That shuts out all grades of terriers, the latter being entirely too popular."

Stukey was at once too absorbed in trying to figure out if such a thing as a white dog with a long tail actually existed, to ask further questions. He heard confusedly such cries as these:

"Nigger up—chauffeur over there."

"I say, do you count pickaninnies?"

"Three down."

"Hold up—they're Cubans."

"Pray for a wedding."

"Here they come—five at a clip."

When his mind seemed to rise again through whirling mists, he was bowing politely to Harrigan and emptying his pockets into his hands, while Wattville was exclaiming:

"Stukey, old sporting proposition, you guessed wrong that time. All the smoke was going down. You owe Mr. Harrigan fifty and a buck."

Their hosts accompanied them to the door, with effusive cordiality.

"Boys, you are wonders!"

"You certainly are."

"Come back tomorrow, we've got a couple of other games to show you."

"Hard luck about the niggers."

"Gentlemen," said Wattville, with a courteous raising of his hat, "I salute you. I have learned something. Believe me, there is no game I know of compares to the fascination of Nigger Up. It has possibilities that make me shudder. Just as soon as the banks re-open, we will call again."

(This story will be concluded in the next issue of the Semi-Monthly Magazine Section.)
