Meat Sticks in Windpipe, Nelson Chokes to Death

N. J. Nelson, aged 55 years, died Sunday noon as the result of a hemorrhage brought on by a piece of meat sticking in his wind-pipe while he was eating dinner with his family.

Nelson was a foundryman employed by the Paxton-Vierling Iron works and lived at 233 Prairie street. Together with his wife, Amelia, and three grown sons, Otto, Frank and Charles, he was dining on a mutton stew, when a bone became lodged in the throat and before aid could be given him he had burst a blood vessel.

A few moments later he expired as the result of strangulation brought on by his efforts to dislodge the meat. The police were notified and Dr. T. T. Harris dispatched to the house, but the man had been dead several minutes. Coroner Crook was summoned and took charge of the body. A post-mortem examination will be held today.
