Adverse weather for the movement of corn brought about a temporary stampede of shorts. There also was a good deal of speculative buying credited to a prominent meat packer. Eastern demand, though, was limited, and primary arrivals heavy. As a result gains were not held, and the market in the end was noticeably weak.

Oats followed the same course as other grain. Offerings on the swells were liberal and came for the most part from dealers on the long side of cora.

Provisions ruled quiet but firm. The sustaining force appeared to be from commission orders based on the strength of the market for hogs.
