THE OMAHA SUNDAY BEE MAGAZINE PAGE

If Miss Montgomery Only Hadn't Forgotten Her Lines-

"I Never Loved Him! Never! Never!! Never!!!" She Cried at Least 100 Times as the Stage Heroine of a Divorce Play When the Stage Lawyer Asked Her If She Loved the Stage Co-Respondent -- and the Stage Jury Acquitted Her

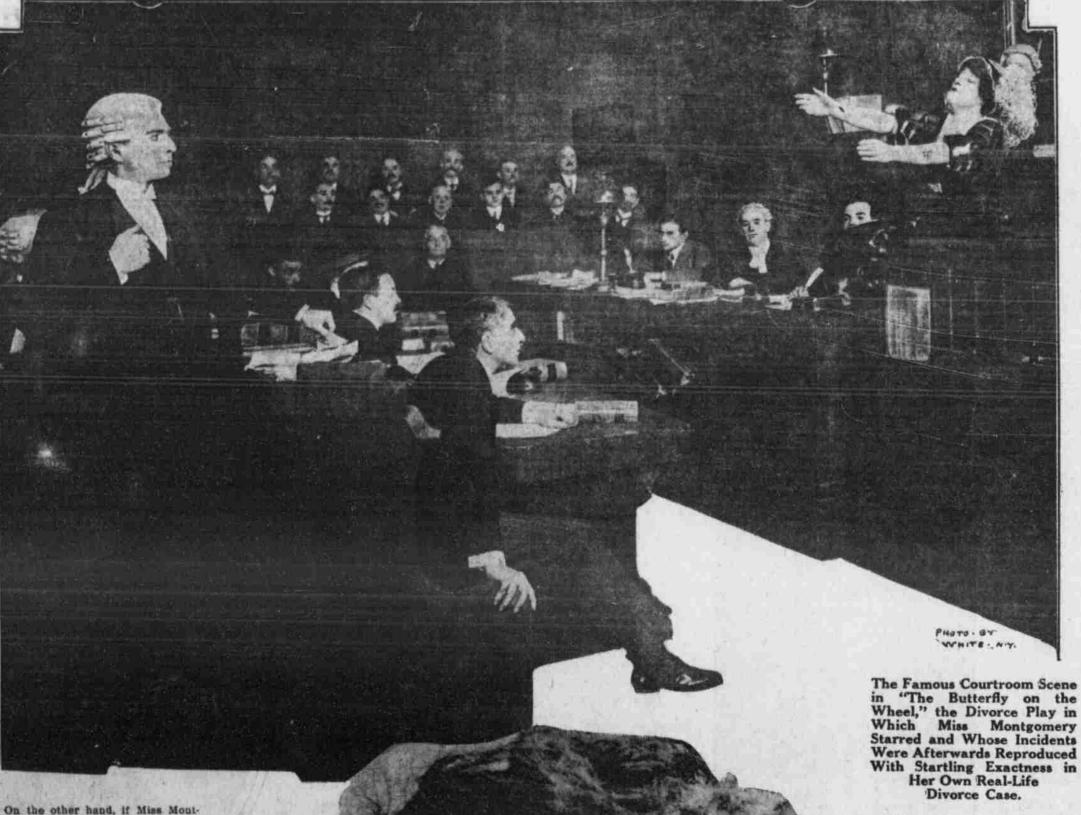

ELL," said Miss Mabel Montgomery, when papers were served upon her calling for her to answer to her iusband's divorce suit in the New fork Supreme Court, "well, that sughtn't to be very hard for me to

"In fact," she continued. "I shall know just exactly what to do. Lawyers won't be able to browbeat me. I won't be too much in awe of the court and I'll know just how to appeal to the jury. There's really nothing to it."

"Fil just go on the stand and tentify in my own behalf," she concluded in a burst of confidence.

For had not Miss Montgomery a. peared time after time as the infortunate heroine, "Peggy Admaton." in Louis Waller's successful play of divorce, "The Butterfly on the Wheel," and matinee after matinee and night after night she had gone upon a stage stand in a stage court room and had explained away a whole series of compromising stage circumstances to the satisfaction of a stage jury, which had finally acquitted her triumphantly? She had indeed.

"What," said MIss Montgomery to herself, "what woman ever was so gomery had recalled the lines of lucky. Hers I know all about just Louis Waller's heroine and had dewhat to say and what to answer and what to do. For of course what goes on the stage will go in real life. Isn't the stage just the mirror of real life anyway? Of course." "Bealdes that," said a friend, "What they saw about you, Mabel, is just exactly almost what they said about Persy. So you won't have to learn any new lines even, Mabel." "Isn't it true? Lovely!" said Miss Montgomery. But the fact remains that Miss Montgomery or Mrs. Augustus Gerlenbach as she is in real life, lost! The real life jury didn't acquit her at all. Miss Montgomery, it can only be inferred, forgot her lines. Miss Montgomery is a very fine actress indeed. She has played in the greatest of roles and is of sufficiently striking personality, which makes it all the harder to understand how she could forget. There was a burz of interest in the New York court room when she took the stand. "Butterfly on the Wheel!" went the whisper. John F. McIntyre, the lamous attorney for former Lieutenant Becker and a figure in many other equally notorious cases, had the Butterfly on his mind too, evi-dently. Miss Montgomery had started off all right, answering and with complete comreadily the questions hurled at her. Mr. McIntyre suddenly changed his ine of cross questioning. 'A year or more ago you were engaged in the play called 'A But-terfly on the Wheel,' were you not?" he asked. Miss Montgomery flushed

After her cross-examiner had brought out all the facts in connection with this incident, he put the

But "I Don't Understand the Question," Was All She Had to Say in Her Own Real Life Divorce Case When the Same Question Was Asked Her by a Real Lawyer and Almost Exactly the Same Court Room Situations Confronted Her--and a Real Jury Found Her Guilty

Q. Or didn't you suppress the truth?

A. Why, he was there to meet me when I came home.

Q. Did you tell James not to tell that, or something like that?

A. There was nothing not to tell. Q. I say did you tell Gertenbach all the truth?

A. Yes, I tried to explain to him. as I remember, just what it was.

Q. What time did you get home? A. It was quite late, I know, because it was after I put the children to bed. We started very late, and I had no idea of the distance we were going. The weather was frightful and the roads were in a terrible condition. I know we got out of the way which led to Canarsle. We had no idea the distance was like that when we started. Finally it was so far that we could not locate the road."

A number of witnesses testified to incidents at the Gertenbach home. which seemed to indicate unusual familiarity between Miss Montgomery and her chauffeur, but Miss and paused. A. Yes, sir, she finally answered. The dialogue ran on. Q. You remember in that play there was a court scene and a divorce suit, do you remember? A. Yes, str.

Q. And in that divorce scene you played and testified, did you not? A. I believe so. 1 don't remem ber 117 parts very long, Mr. Mcintyre, I have to study so many; I gengrally forget them as soon as 1 playing them. At that time

I had to take up such big work. Q. In the play of "The Butterfly on the Wheel" you took one of the principal characters in that play? You, sir.

Among other things, you had figure more or less prominently in the divorce scene that was staged that play?

A. 5 bellove so.

Here Mr. McIntyre dropped the inject-but right here Miss Monimary seems to have begun to for get her coaching in the play. Per-haps Mr. McIntyro was, himself, satisfied that Miss Montgomery had really forgotten the lines. Had he roard this line of examination that he would have developed at in many respects the part that he Memigramery took in the play an practically identical with the was shen playing in actual once delivered them on the stage, who can say that the real jury might NOT have seen influenced by her eloquence on the stage jury had been? An interesting question is left up in the air.

Many of the answers which "Peggy Admaston" made in the play would, for instance, not only have been entirely appropriate as an swers to questions which Mr. Mc-Intyre put to her in the real court scene, but the chances are they would have been more effective than the answers Miss Montgomery actually made.

When, for instance, Mr. Mo-Intyre hurled at the defendant the following question: "Eleanor says that she saw you and Mooney (the co-respondent) kissing on various occasions. You say to the jury that she does not speak truthfully?" Miss Montgomery's answer started off all right, but it lacked the fine dramatic quality of "The Butterfly." "It is absolutely faise," was all she said.

Not so short was Peggy in the play when Sir Robert Fyfee, the cross-examiner, suggests that a certain meeting with the co-respondent which Peggy had explained as acci-dental was deliberately arranged between them. Peggy takes the bit her teeth, and the following col loguy takes place:

Peggy: I tell you that all those suggestions are absolutely faise. There is not a rag of truth in any of them. You may think you can make black white and white black, you may suborn spies, tamper with railway servants and walters-

"Judge: Mrs. Admaston!

"Peggy: And do all the rest of the degrading work which seems inseparable from this court-"Judge: Mrs. Admaston, you must not speak like that. "Peggy: And what right have they to treat me like this? Am I to be treated as guilty merely be-cause I have foolishly courted temptation? I don't know what I have said. I don't know what shall say before this torture is complete, but I am sensible snough know I have no chance against all this horrible insinuation which twists every bit of harmless and girlish folly into some victous and basing form. I can't keep quiet I tell you it in all-ALL LINS-nothing but LIES!"

And when, in the real court scene, ir. McIntyre put this question: Whom did you care the more for Mooney or your husband? Miss Montgomery answered) "It is not to be compared.

And later on, when Mcintyre put this question: "You were pretty familiar with this chauffour?" Miss atgamery answered: "Not familtar, no sir.

In the play, however, when stir

Miss Mabel Montgomery, Whose Real Life Divorce Suit Turned Out So Differently from Her Stage One.

Robert Fyfee started a question thus: "Now, Mrs. Admaston, do you state that you and your lover"-Peggy burst out with the following indignant answer:

"Peggy: How dare you suggest that he was my lover? I tell you that I have never loved him, never, never, NEVER! If i had loved him do you think I would be here now? For months and months he begged and entreated me to let my husband divorce me so that I could marry him. If I had loved him, do you think that I would have faced this horrible place? I have never loved him. I have been I have toyed his admira-I have played with fire. 1500.

never knew that the law-man's law-made no difference between the opportunity to do wrong and the giving way to it. Some day men who know wonies will make other laws, but some of us must have our lives broken first. In the face of the evidence, no man would believe me, whatever I say, but I awear before God I have done nothing wrong-pothing-but no one will believe me-no one!

The case against Miss Montgomery was based upon her friend-ship with James Mooney, her chauffeur. It appeared that after she and her husband had separated, she had started Monney in the gasolene hustness. She declared that it was Copprignt, 1915, my the Stur Company. Great Britain Hights Hotorwood purely a business relation that existed between her and "Jimmy" they ware business partners. The line of testimony brought out to show how closely their relationship brought Miss Montgomery and Jimmy together was not very unlike the testimony in the play to show that Peggy and the co-respondent were passingately in love with each other

In the play, too, the whole case againt. Peggy was founded upon an incident which brought her and the co-respondent, Collinwood, together in 5 Paris hotel. Peggy claimed that that incident was an accident. Hey husband produced strong testimony to show it was designed.

following question:

"Well, does it not strike you, Mrs. Admaston, that anyone would have good ground for supposing that the accident which brought about the last of this series of innocent and pleasant reunions was in reality not an accident but deliberate design?"

And Peggy answered: "i see what you mean, but, whatever any one thought, it WAS an accident!" A similar situation was brought out in Miss Montgomery's real divorce case.

Here is the testimony: Q. Before the night of the raid did you have Jimmy stay out with you over night? A. I remember one night. I was trying to hunt up a dressmaker, and she lived some place away out near Canarsie, and we had a great deal of difficulty in finding her, and I was out very late that night.

When you spoke to Mr. Gerten-Q. bach concerning that visit to Canarsie, did you tell Mr. Gertenbach the truth? A. I did.

Montgomery endeavored to explain them all satisfactorily. The most damaging evidence produced against her, no doubt, was that of witnesses who testified to a raid upon her room after she had separated from her husband, at which time Mooney was found in her company. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty and Gertenbach was granted divorce.

Whether or not the lines of the play might have brought about a different result if Miss Montgomery had recalled and used them is, of course, problematical, but Miss Montgomery herself is inclined to believe that the case was hopeless for her anyway, in view of the testimony brought against her.

"It was my word against that of others," she declared, "and you can never tell how a real jury will decide.' No matter how much perjury is committed, a jury may not regard it as such, and then the rightcous will suffer and the wrong prevall! Peggy was innocent and the jury believed her. I was innocent and the jury didn't believe me. That's all!"

The Most Humane Way of Breaking a Setting Hen

By JOHN T. TIMMONS. The Distinguished Horticultural Expert.

LL sorts of methods have been advanced and tried for breaking a hen of her desire to set, and some have been fairly successful, but none has proven as humane and successful as the method employed by a poultryman in eastern Ohio,

Certain breeds of poultry are more determined to set than others, and it seems almost impossible to break the hens and cause them to return to laving again. Alarm clocks which would ring a bell every minute for a long time. and dollar watches with a loud tick were used with more or less success, and chestnut burrs with very sharp thorns were placed in the nests with good effect. The latter were not considered humane, however, because of the very tender skin on the breast of the setting hen. A more humane method was desired, and to find out just the best method a number of different kinds of coops or prisons were built, and setting hens were confined to secortals which way was the most offective.

After a number of interesting tests of coops one was selected. It was plain and square, with a roof that would shed the rain. It had open slatted sides, with a floor made of very narrow strips set a half luch apart, to permit a free circulation of air through the coop, and beneath the hen if she decided to set on the floor of the coop.

An ordinary board gathers the heat from the body of a setting hen, and it only requires a few minutes for the spot where she is setting to become warm. With the open cracks between the narrow strips the heat from the hon escapes, and the wind coming up through the openings in the floor of the coop reduces the desire to set.

To get the best results the little prison should be placed on four legs at least two feet from the ground floor of the poultry house, permitting a free circulation of the cool air beneath the floor of the coop containing the hens that want to set.

Actual experience shows it will take much less time to convert a setting hen into a laying one in such a device than in any other form of coop, or by the use of any of the numerous and very unique ways of getting the hen out of the notion she must set.

One of the secrets in breaking a setting hen lies in taking advantage of an early start. If she is broken of the dealre to set just as soon as she begins to ciura and abows a desirs to remain on the nest, she will lay more eggs in a given time than if she is taken later. The slatted coop described will aid in her prodorties.