One Year of the War.

Today completes one year of the European war, twelve months of continuous conflict, with all precedents outdone, all prophecies upset, and no indication as to when it will terminate. Wa had been told the modern military machinery had made war so terrible in its potentiality for death and destruction that it could not continue long, so costly in its operation that nations could not afford to maintain hostilities for a great length of time, and that any war must soon be over. Three months was the time set by many when the troops under Von Kluck began to pour across the Belgian border. But man's ingenuity met offense with defense, and under the shelter of trenches armies have withstood the assault of opposing armies. In the air and beneath the sea foes have grappled, and still the earth trembles under the shock of the conflict. Twelve months have gone, and millions of men and billions of treasure have been wasted and no one can say with certainty when it is to be over.

The German Press Attitude.

The attitude of the German press on the latest American note is certainly not calculated to allay the growing friction between the two countries. The newspaper expressions practically set up that Germany was completely within her rights, and fully justified, in sinking the Lusitania without opportunity to save passengers and crew, and that there is no reason for disavowing the act, nor even for admitting the justice of any claim for compensation to the families of the innocent victims.

Had Germany made this baid answer to our first Lusitania note no one could have foreseen the consequences. While the German diplomatic correspondence on the subject, it is true, has so far evaded the question of responsibility on the pretense that the Lusitania was in reality armed, and subject to call as an auxiliary cruiser for the British navy, the kaiser's spokesmen were careful to convey the impression that they wanted these questions of fact submitted to further inquiry or arbitration.

If German submarines have an undefeasible right to sink without warning merchant vessels carrying contraband, and regardless of the flag they may be flying, then, of course, there is nothing whatever to submit to arbitration, and all the interchange of notes must from the first have been an exchange of mere "scraps of paper." We do not believe, however, that the attitude of the German press will be the position taken by the German government. What the German newspapers are saying, however, makes it all the more important that we wait with patience for the official response to our note.

Where Milton is a Back Number.

When John Milton wrote in "Paradise Lost" of the conflict between the loyal hosts of heaven under the command of Michael and the rebellious angels, led by Lucifer, he penned a magnificent bit of description. But he suffered under the limitations of his time. The Baconian compound of brimstone and saltpeter had yet on its swaddling clothes, so to speak, and its potentiality for cussedness was beyond even the flight of Milton's - majestic fancy. Therefore, the offensive and defensive engines with which he armed the embattled hosts of heaven were scarcely more deadly than the bombards and the petards used in earthly warfare.

But what a picture he might now outline were he to be given the opportunity of revising his stately periods and introducing into their pregnant phrases something of the modern machinery for the elimination of life and the expunging of man's proudest works! Milton gained immortality as a poet, but, in the light own, in mind as the one which "staggers hu- of what is going on today, as an artilierist he is a back number.

Steamboat Inspection Service Needs Shaking Up.

To accomplish "safety at sea" under the American flag will require something more than the passage of legislation prescribing the number and quality of sailors to be on board of vessels. Conditions at Chicago support this assertion. Eight separate inquiries into the Eastland horror have been started, which almost justifies the conclusion that some of these are to conceal rather than reveal facts in connection with the terrible affair.

The Eastland was known to be unsafe, but was permitted to continue in business as an excursion boat, and to load to its fullest limit. In the present instance it is known to have exceeded the limit allowed by the government. All acquainted with lake shipping knew the story of the Eastland's disastrous career, but none interposed objection to its use in a service wherein thousands of lives were carelessly jeopardized. Now we find the port officials, the inspection officers, the police, the federal grand jury, the Department of Commerce and other agencies busy on ex post facto inquiries to develop facts they must have been familiar with before the awful dieaster of last Saturday.

The charge is made that other vessels on the lakes are equally unsafe, and this should be inouiringly considered. The owners and officers of the Eastland are to be dealt with by the law, but what is to be done with government officials, charged with the duty of preventing such accidents, who permit the continued sailings of a vessel known to be unsafe? The whole service of steamboat inspection evidently needs a shaking up.

Make the Street Numbers Uniform.

Commissioner Jardine is on the right track in moving for a house renumbering in South Omaha that will bring about uniformity with the street numbers in Omaha, and the renaming of streets that are confusing because of their duplication. No doubt the plan will encounter objections and protests, but something of this kind is necessary for the very reason of street-naming and house-numbering.

Omaha, itself, had to make this change when it supplanted the consecutive numbering with the so-called decimal system that moves the house numbers up a hundred from one block to the next. This decimal system has so demonstrated its superiority that scarcely a city of any importance still clings to the older method. But the essence of the decimal system of street numbering is uniformity throughout the entire area of the city, because a gap or duplication destroys its usefulness, and that is why no remnant of eradicated city boundaries should stand in the way of perfecting it.

Twice Told Tales

Little Willie was sitting on the front porch of the happy home one Saturday afternoon, when reference was made to the Sunday dinner outlay.

"I was thinking about chicken," remarked mother, then, turning to little Willie, queried: "Do you think you could eat some chicken tomorrow. Willie? "Could I?" responded Willie, with a great yearning expression. "You just bet a hundred on it!" "All right, then," smiled mother. "We'll make it chicken. What would you like it stuffed with?"

"Another chicken," was the prompt rejoinder of little Willie. Philadelphia Telegraph.

A Farewell Tip.
