To have friends taste jovially to the full significance of the word and at the limit of a comrade's expense, was the unexpected experience of a certain young man at a social function a few evenings ago.

To keep curiosity from playing its part too freely, I am going to call this young man "Mike." Now "Mike" is a born heretic on shirts and "Mike's" shirts are different from anything you ever saw. The styles displayed in the regular way, in the regular shops, are entirely too irregular with his ideas of fashion. Under no circumstance would he deign to wear such commonplace stuff; so he resorts to special patterns, and has them cut in a most individual manner and by distinguished makers of garments for men. There has always been one objection to "Mike's" excellent taste. He had displayed a tiresome faculty for not knowing which shirt to wear and fellow friends have spent much time scheming how he might be broken of the habit.

The coveted moment presented itself, when an acquaintance was in "Mike's" office as he was untying a bundle containing half a dozen silk shirts. Each was different from the other and all second to none in Omaha. The garments were in time for a particular function at which "Mike's" beloved was to accompany him, and he languorously displayed his inability to choose the shirt which would best suit the occasion. The visiting friend got real tired and left "Mike's" office planning.

I will not go further with details, except to state that at the function "Mike" and his lady friend were there and so were all of the six new silk shirts, but not one of them adorned "Mike's" athletic body.
