War Removes Many Familiar Characters On London Streets

(Correspondence of The Associated Press.) LONDON, Feb. 28.—Almost complete disappearance of the ragged but picturesque street vendors and other itinerant frequenters of London's thoroughfares is one of the notable changes brought about by a year and a half of war.

Before hostilities began the curbsides of the principal streets were lined from morning to night by hawkers of pirated copies of popular songs, cheap toy sellers and match vendors, while at every few yards the passerby was accosted by a man or woman carrying a fruit basket or a tray laden with chocolates or other candies.

Other characters of London's streets whose disappearance, so the contrary is registered, are the red-coated shoe blacks formerly seen on every street corner and around the railroad stations. The disagreeable London mud, owing up in case of wet weather owing to the clayey composition of the subsoil, makes these men a bothersome nuisance, and also that of the crossing sweepers who at the junctions of frequented streets sweep narrow pathways through the mud and whose services were much appreciated by the women.

The push cart men or "bottle-mongers" with their little donkey barrows full of cheap vegetables which they loudly offered for sale in the suburban districts away from the shopping centers have gone—many of them to serve in the army.

The "muffin and crumpet" men with their warm wares for afternoon tea, whose advent in the streets after lunch was heralded by the ringing of a bell, have quit their rounds for bakers whose services are required for the making of army bread and cannot be spared for luxuries.

The "shell fish" stalls, formerly much used by patrons of saloons after their favorite houses had closed at midnight and where they consumed whisky and smokes soaked in vinegar and sprinkled thickly with pepper, are no more in evidence, having accompanied the hot baked potato can into oblivion with the introduction of the new lighting regulations which they could not avoid infringing if they desired to continue their trade with success.

Many of the workers at these peculiar "trades" are now engaged in the service of their country in making ammunition for the troops at the front, and whether they will ever return to their old stands after the war is a moot point.

GASOLINE MAKING ECONOMY

Independent Oil Companies Contract with Government for Rittman Process. Dispatches announce that seven independent oil companies have signed contracts with the government, agreeing to make use of the Walter F.
