SHEEP--If yeslerday's cheep and lamb run was small, today's was indireceiple, for only four cars, or about 1,000 head, were reported in. Barring fisturdays and boildays, this is the smallest for any one day since Junk last year. For the week to date receipts foot u. 34,671 head, being about 100 head farger than a week ago, but amaller than for the corresponding days of jast year by more than 12,000 head, and 2,000 head than for the corresponding days of jast year by more than 12,000 head.

There was really not enough of anything here to make a market today, and while selliers tried hard enough to head values thay found themselves unable to get much if any, better than steady prices. One or two traders quoted prices atropar, but as grean's thing the market was railed just steady. Lamb offerings were pretty evenly divided between native springs and dry lot dippers, no rangers arriving. Best native springs self to $11.50, with a fair kind down to $15.50. Another out of the weighty aborn-less westerns took $5.50, while a lighter kind reached $5.50.

that the man with the deferential manners of a well-trained servant was in reality an unknown but dangerous emeny. It was Mahlin, who had bribed one of the servants furnished by the caterer to let, him take his place.

And now," said Mrs. Delmar, turning to Geo, "I want to introduce some men to you. Mr. Hope tells me that this is your first real party and his determined that you shall have a good time. Here comes a man now sat I want you to know," and she beckuned to a man who was crossing the floor with a tall and strikingly landsome brunette.

"Way, it's Mr. Morton!" exclaimed

Cao. I didn't know that he was here lave you known him long, Mrs. Dal

"I never met him until tonight, but te seems to be a very charming felow. He had the Countess Ivanoff, the lady who is with him, are old resads of my husband's vice consultive Paget. Linvited them on his account."

"This is indeed a pleasant surprise, Miss Burke," said Morton, gazing at leso in such open admiration that her yes dropped in confusion. "Now I su giad I came. You look as though yet had come straight from the Rue in Pair, May I have this dance?" Che glanced at Hope, who was alcardy deen in an animated conversation with the countees. or asked abruptly, and in an inmarked the state of the s pected opportunity had been thrown in his way ahd he intended to make the most of it. He had had much experience in the game of love, but he had never played it for such high stakes, or when it was so vitally necessary for him to win, and he appreciated, moreover that, were he to be auccessful he would have to play with consummate skill. Nor did he make the mistake of underrating his adversary, Jarvis Hope. He knew that the young navel officer held an assured place in Cleo's affections, but he also knew from experience that it is alway-easy to make a woman jeatous of the man she loves. And he determined that his first move should be to stir up jealousy between Hope and Cleo. When the dance was over, following the customary rules of the game, he suggested to Cleo that they take a stroll upon the terrace, and it was there, in a nook formed by a screen of palms, that they were found, half an hour later, by Hope and Olga. "Tye been looking for you everywhere, Cleo," he said sternly. "Why

"I have been talking to Mr. Morton." Cleo answered. "But," she Morton saw with satisfaction that a lover's quarrel was brewing, but it was ended almost before it began by Mrs. Delmar, who at that moment stepped onto the terrace.

"Oh, Mr. Hope," she cried, catching tight of the group behind the palms, "I've been looking all over for you. The butler tells me that my nephew came half an hour ago. He must have taken the books upstairs/though I can't understand why that stupid servant at the door didn't let me know. Don't you and Miss Burke want to go up to the study and look

As Hope and Cleo followed their hosters into the house, Morton and Olga looked at each other significantly "We must follow them," Olga whispered.

Olga whispered.

When Francis Leyland arrived he was met at the door by Mahlin, who recognized him by the package under
