Better Send-Off Should Have Been Given to Militia

Mrs. Bertha Getschmann, one of the Omaha mothers who gave a son to the militia, protests against the apparent lack of appreciation on the part of Omaha citizens.

She declares that the efforts and intentions of the young men who rally about the colors when their country needs them are entitled to more encouragement than they got when they entrained for the concentration camp at Lincoln.

"Where was the Commercial club? The city and county officials? The civic organizations of which we hear so much, but see so little? Why was there not a band to greet the boys as they marched out of Omaha, perhaps never to return again? Why, Mayor Dahlman was the only city official I saw who took enough interest even to come down to the train to bid the boys farewell. The only others interested, apparently, were relatives and close personal friends.

"In other cities the departure of the militia companies was marked by a demonstration that infused the boys and the community alike with the serious importance of the event.

"True heroism, of course, is without ostentation; the boys showed that by marching down Harney street to the depot instead of parading through the city. It was the solemn duty of Omaha citizens to have prepared some kind of fitting ceremony to mark the occasion, and Omaha failed to do its duty." Mayor Dahlman also expressed similar sentiments.

Of course, the time was so short that the boys barely had time to get together and entrain. However, it would have taken but little preparation to have provided the royal send-off to which they were entitled. I'm sorry it was not done."
