THE trend of the modes in hats is toward the small sizes. Most women are aware that the small hat is not as "youthful" as the large. Those women who cling to their youthfulness of aspect as a drowning man at a straw forewear the small hat because it is suggestive of the old woman's bonnet. Those who are more analytical explain that they do not wear the small hat because, having no brim, it affords no shade for the face, so throwing the face's lines and hollow places into strong relief.

The hats shown on this page are specimens of smart small hats that are favored for general wear. The attractive turban looks equally well with a trotteur costume or skating garb. The crown, of light velvet, is surrounded by a broad band of moleskin, superimposed on which are silver ribbons and rosebuds.

The saucy felt hat of a light shade has a dauntless upturned brim, fastened at the side by a cockade of metallized ribbon. The crown is defined by skunk fur.

The sailor makes a vigorous claim for the maintenance of its popularity. It grows larger. In many instances the brim is upturned. Fan-like ornaments of color contrasting with that of the hat are used for decorations. The style of sailor hats most in demand at the moment are of the Spanish type.

The shirred cap is one of the favorites of the season. Made of silk or velvet, it is a dainty headdress, extremely becoming to the youthful face. If the youthful face is a pretty one, the becomingness is still more pronounced. The caps, which are modifications of the recurrent "mob" type, are especially appropriate for evening wear.
