Society Notes
January 12. by Mellifica

Prof. Stoughton Holborn's lecture before the Drama League yesterday at the Blackstone now and again took a sly poke at the pleasures which are the very backbone of social entertaining. For instance, said the artistic professor, "Greek drama must be essentially united. It must never be chaotic like what I say—a modern dinner party. The Greeks had a better arrangement even at their dinner parties, for there only one person spoke at a time and everything was done decently and in order."

Another statement which evoked a ripple of laughter from the society audience was this: "The Greek drama was purely artistic, a creation of the imagination, it was as far removed from realism as possible. Realism is a sign of decadence. The Greek drama was written for an intelligent audience. The modern drama assumes that its audience lacks intelligence and takes great pains to put everything in view of our dull eyes."

Another of society's old reliable amusements Prof. Holborn criticized—the opera. He said that it had miserably, contemptibly failed in its attempt to be high art because of its mixture of realistic and artistic elements.

One of his illustrations contained a sparkle of humor. It slipped in so casually that it came like a big surprise and the audience smiled reminiscently. "I presume," said he, "that you, like the rest of the world, amuse yourself by writing sonnets." Some of Omaha's unknown poets must have been hidden among the audience, for some of the debutantes and more of the matrons cast surreptitious glances at their companions, as if fearful of detection.

Social Gossip.

Fashion Hint

By LA RACONTEUSE.

Afternoon frock of brown chiffon velvet with snug turban of the same material.

A band of beaver fur finishes the odd Chinese collar. Particularly notable is the clever manner in which the satin and chiffon velvet are treated, thus cutting the otherwise straight, long line from shoulder to hem. Notable, too, is the sash arrangement.

Advice to the Lovelorn

By Beatrice Fairfax.

There are other ways. Dear Miss Fairfax: We are two young working people. An argument has arisen between us and we have decided to let you settle it.

For some time I have been accepting of a young man. The other day I suggested that once in a while he let me invite him to the theater. In other words, to let me treat once in a while instead of always being treated. Of course he contends that this is not "prompt," "all wrong," etc., and I argue that it would make me feel happier, less of a grafter, and seeing that we both must earn our own living, only fair play.

I like your spirit. Evidently you are not one of those girls who like to accept all and return nothing. But your idea of how to do your share of the entertaining is all wrong. First of all when you give your interested friendliness, you are honoring this young man. Secondly, the place for a girl to entertain is in her own home. If you wish to invite him to a meal or to tea, well and good. If this is out of the question, you might make him something for Christmas—monogrammed handkerchiefs you have marked will show your friendly appreciation of what he has done for you.
