Reviving Open House Custom.
Miss Alice Duval has revived a most delightful custom of keeping open house and you may be sure that her many friends are taking advantage of her warm hospitality and are helping to make it a great success. Every Sunday afternoon about 4 o'clock Miss Duval is at home to her friends and they spend the afternoon in visiting and having informal musicales.

The greatest treat of all is tea time, for among the other delicacies on the tea table are Mrs. Duval's toothsome individual butterscotch pies, which are becoming household favorites among her friends. So those of us who are not lucky enough to be migrating to the south for the winter may (if we number her as one of our friends) taste the far-famed southern hospitality, not to mention those famous butterscotch pies, without experiencing the many inconveniences of traveling and crowded hotels, and our purses won't feel nearly so flat in the spring.

But seriously speaking, how splendid it would be if more of our homes in Omaha were opened, as is the custom in so many American as well as foreign cities, for a sociable cup of tea at regular intervals.

In the busy whirl of social, intellectual and commercial life which threatens at times almost to engulf us, calling on friends has been nearly relegated as a thing of the past and consequently there is sacrificed not only a most enjoyable custom, but perhaps a little of the generous and informal hospitality for which our grandmothers and grandfathers were so distinguished.

And after all, it is at the informal affairs rather than the large ones that real interest in others is most likely to be kindled and lasting friendship formed.

The following decrees have been granted in district court: Gertrude L. Armstrong from James Armstrong. Albert A. Harkins from Myrtle Harkins. Hazel Simonson from Ernest Simonson. Catherine Mohler from William M. Mohler.

Love that has been tainted with doubt, love that has been bruised with hard words, love that has had to forgive, or be forgiven, is never quite the same again. The wound will heal, but the scar remains, and the patched up faith and affection can never be as strong as that which has never been strained or broken.

If the quarrels between friends or lovers are dangerous, those between husbands and wives are fatal. The one is a sparring match with gloves, the other is a fight to a finish with bare knuckles.

In the domestic spat quarrel is neither asked nor given. The black flag is nailed to the mast, and nothing and nobody is spared. It is the desecration of all that is holy and sacred in love. It is the shattering of ideals. It is the tearing down of one's gods, and no matter how much one may try to repair the damage it can never be done.

The altar on which the fire of conjugal love burned has been broken, and forever after it will be rickety and ready to topple over at the slightest jostle. Besides, nobody ever worships again the thing that they have trodden in the dust under their feet.

To the man and woman who wish to love each other—whose very happiness is dependent on their loving each other, since they are tied together in the bonds of matrimony—there can be no folly equal to the madness of indulging in foolish family quarrels.

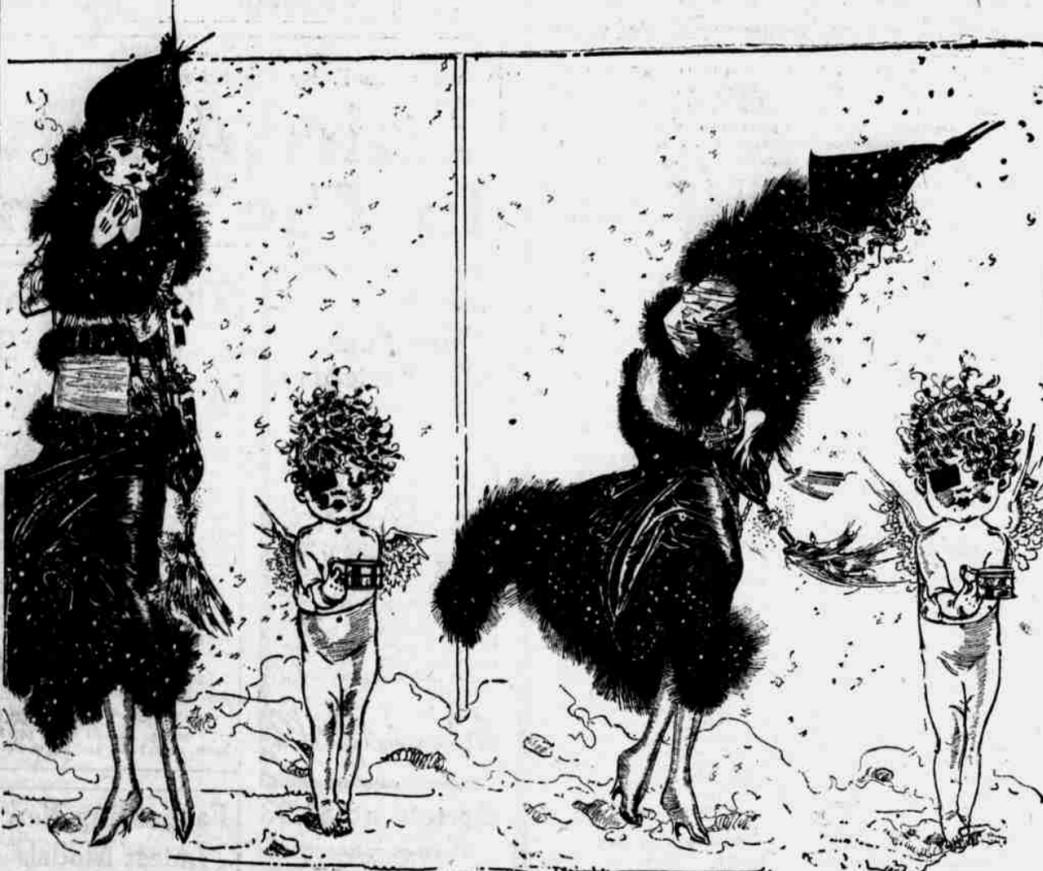

Love Is Blind

But Not Too Blind to See a Pretty Girl

By Nell Brinkley

Do We Eat Too Much Salt?

By LUCILLE CAINE.

Aphrodite's son asks aims. Everywhere. His silvery-toussed head is seen piteously in the winter streets—one foot atop the other to warm a pink sole at a time. He smiles in the Spring streets when the maples are in a cloud of delicate bud—and his head rises like a yellow jonquil from the stone walling by the sidewalk. He grins in Summer and seems to need largess more than ever, though his little ivory and rose body can go naked with joy. And, passing him—girl and womankind—wavers and leans and cannot resist. For he is blind. But not so blind but that if she is pretty—that leaning damsel—she nods a round, merry, adoring, robin-eye flying open into her own!

Love Can Survive Many Things, But Unkind Words Slay It

By DOROTHY DIX.

It is a curious thing that speech, which is the chief instrument in winning love, is also the weapon that oftentimes slays it. This is always a bewildering grief and surprise to us, because it is as if the sword that had fought for cupid was suddenly and traitorously turned against him. It is not what people do that we find unforgivable. It is the things that they say to us that rankle like poisoned arrows in our breasts, and more affection has been blighted by gratuitous criticism and more love killed by cruel speeches than by all the sins and crimes on the calendar.

Yet, in spite of this common knowledge, there are men and women foolish enough to tell each other of their faults, and still expect to be loved and cherished. Vain hope! Criticism we may be able to stand from strangers, for whose opinion we do not care, but every word of dispraise from those we love, and in whose eyes we would shine, is a drop of acid that burns to the bone.

"Faithful," says the Good Book, "are the wounds of a friend." They are also fatal. There is no surer and quicker way for a couple, whether they are engaged or married, to shoo love out of the window than for them to tell each other of little idiosyncrasies and peculiarities that might be altered for the better.

Most people regard quarrels lightly, as a matter of no importance. They even stultify themselves by saying that "the falling out of faithful friends is the renewing of love," but nothing is farther from the truth.

The first time that we discover that the lips that have dropped honey can likewise drop gall, something goes out of our hearts that never comes back again.

Love that has been tainted with doubt, love that has been bruised with hard words, love that has had to forgive, or be forgiven, is never quite the same again. The wound will heal, but the scar remains, and the patched up faith and affection can never be as strong as that which has never been strained or broken.

If the quarrels between friends or lovers are dangerous, those between husbands and wives are fatal. The one is a sparring match with gloves, the other is a fight to a finish with bare knuckles.

In the domestic spat quarrel is neither asked nor given. The black flag is nailed to the mast, and nothing and nobody is spared. It is the desecration of all that is holy and sacred in love. It is the shattering of ideals. It is the tearing down of one's gods, and no matter how much one may try to repair the damage it can never be done.

The altar on which the fire of conjugal love burned has been broken, and forever after it will be rickety and ready to topple over at the slightest jostle. Besides, nobody ever worships again the thing that they have trodden in the dust under their feet.

Yet, in the majority of households, they are as much a matter of course as breakfast or dinner, and those who thus wantonly wound love excuse their crime by saying that a husband and wife never remember such offenses against each other. They forgive and forget. They kiss and make up, and the incident is closed.

Those who offer this apology for their weakness are neither candid nor honest. They know that what they say is not possible. They know that nobody ever either forgives or forgets.

In temper, as in wine, there is truth, and in the heat of passion husbands and wives flash out the bitter accusations, and scathing criticism, the rankling disappointment and disillusion that policy and prudence bid them hide in saner moments.

This is what makes the excuse, "I didn't mean what I said to you when I was angry," so futile. We may seem to accept it, and even return a Judas kiss of pretended reconciliation. But we all know, with a ghastly certainty, that it is when people are angry that they say just what they do mean, and show us exactly how we stand in their regard.

But the most deadly of all wounds that the tongue deals love is nagging. No affection, no matter how strong it was to begin with, survives that continual pinpricking. Love bleeds to death from a thousand merciless stabs. Worse still, it has been murdered by slow torture, and for this there is no pardon in this world or the next.

Men kill love oftentimes with deeds. Women with words. Perhaps that is why women find it easier to forgive men than men do women.
