Steamed Puddings

In these days when the mercury is just as apt to jump below the zero line as above it, we naturally want hot foods straight through a meal and we enjoy puddings of the "hearty" type. It is easy to understand why a hot dessert should be desired; there is an equally good reason for desiring a heavy dessert. In cold weather we not only conserve our body heat by extra clothing, but we also must manufacture more heat within the body. For this extra heat additional fuel is needed in the shape of food, either larger quantities, or richer kinds, or both.

given to people who must be careful of their diet, or to little children. It should never be served at a meal where the main course has been especially rich, such as goose or pork. Instead of special molds, empty baking powder, cocoa or coffee cans may be used. As a matter of convenience, a steamed pudding may be made ahead of time and reheated in its original mold, over hot water, just before serving.

thirty-five minutes. Serve with preserved fruit or marmalade. Sauces for Puddings. A steamed pudding is incomplete without some kind of a special sauce. Cream seems quite inadequate. Though special sauces have been suggested for the different puddings, the sauces may be varied at will. Perhaps Hard Sauce is the most universally used.
