WHEN MAN MEETS MAN AND DEATH

Many a Tragedy Lurks Behind Laconic Story of Clashes in the Clouds.

MERE BOYS ARE BIRDMEN

With the British Armies in France, Jan. 8.—The announcement that "improved weather conditions permitted increased aerial activity along the entire front" is the laconic and prosaic way in which the official communique dismisses some of the most spectacular episodes of the war.

To those who have once witnessed this "increased aerial activity" such an announcement conjures up at once a picture of countless aeroplanes in the air—scouting, fighting, diving, spinning, hovering over enemy targets and calmly sending wireless signals through the fountains of enemy fire, photographing the enemy lines, bombing his ammunition dumps and sheds and supply columns, and otherwise "carrying on" in the sky in a manner wholly bewildering to the onlooker.

With a candor often uncommon in times of strife, the British communique may end from day to day with the simple statement that one or two or three or four "of our machines have either been hit and forced to land in the enemy lines, or have been shot down to a fate more certain. It is no child's play to circle above a German battery observing for half an hour or more, tortured by exploding shells and black shrapnel, puffballs coming near and wearing like the extending finger tips of some hand of death. But they are little more than children—these mere boys who are bringing the luster of everlasting fame to the British aviation service.

Some are scarce eighteen. It is rare to find a flying man over twenty-five. Important Work. In the aggregate, however, the losses in the flying corps are as nothing compared with the useful and vital work the "wings" accomplish.

The "good flying" of a single day on the British front alone may represent a day of a hundred fights, a day of four score aeroplanes in wing-towing combat—a day of a thousand personal incidents and deeds of daring in the once strange strata of high thin air.

It might tell, for instance, of how Lieutenant A in a fast-flying scout machine, encountering a squadron of twelve German Roland, the odds were one-sided enough, but the young Britisher decided to take a chance. He climbed swiftly and surely until he got far above and to the rear of the hostile craft.

Under the newest order the police have power when a soldier's wife is taken to a police station for drunkenness to detain her till she is sober and dismiss her with an appeal to her better nature. If after a second warning she persists in "such irregularity of conduct" loss of the separation allowance ensues.
