SMITHSONIAN HAS FIRST LINOTYPE

Invention Which Revolutionized Printing is in Graphic Arts Museum.

WORKED WELL FIRST TIME

Washington, D. C., Feb. 17.—The first machine from which linotype bars or slugs were cast has lately been deposited in the division of graphic arts of the United States National Museum, and is located in the Smithsonian building.

Every big-town daily newspaper in the country employs from fifteen to thirty-five of these machines, and every daily uses one or two, so that there must be about 24,000 used in the daily newspaper offices in the United States and Canada alone.

There are three machines exhibited in the Smithsonian halls, which are closely related to the development of this contribution to the art of printing. Two of them are early models, which indented strips of paper made (matrices) from which stereotype casts were made.

He started work with L. G. Hine, early in 1883, making a small experimental machine, which printed but twelve letters at a time, but demonstrated the fact that a full-sized machine built on this principle would be an enormous step in advance.
