CHAPTER V.

BILLY BELGIUM didn't wait to soon as he said he was going to the aid of the strange children in the attic he began to creep out on a branch of the tree that overhung the window. But first he threw aside his fantastic "Fun" costume. As the branch bent with him, he reached out with his foot and shoved the window in.

"If there is a kidnaper here and he catches me, run to the Giant of the Woods and bring him to the rescue," he called to Peggy.

With that Billy swung himself close to the window, caught the ledge with his hands and drew himself inside. Peggy had started to climb the tree to share the danger with him. But now she paused. It would be brave to go with Billy, but it would be wiser to wait and give the alarm if he should need help. Billy was back at the window before she could scramble to the starved to death!" Billy shoved a ladder through the window from the inside, and as soon as the lower end rested on the ground he began to climb down, oringing with him the little lad. The boy was white and unconscious. Peggy's heart leaped out to him in quick sympathy, for he was only a tiny youngster of 5 years and looked terribly thin and frail. She tenderly bent over him when Billy Belgium laid him on the ground and started back for the little girl. In a mo-ment he was back again, his load this time being much heavier, for the girl was as large as Peggy.

"Bring the water pail," cried Peggy, who was rubbing the wrists of the lad to get his blood circulating. Billy rushed into the school and was quickly back with the bucket. He and Peggy dashed water into the faces of the unconscious children and rubbed their wrists briskly. The boy was white and unconscious

"They are French war orphans and they have been hiding in that school five days. For two days they haven't had a bite to eat," interpreted Billy. "Oh, how awful," sobbed Peggy,

"We were happy till the war came. Father went as a soldier. The Germans swept through our village, wrecking it with their guns. They took mother away. Jean and I starved and starved, while the guns boomed, boomed, boomed. The Germans were cruel. We hid from them in caves. Then the French came back. They took us from the village and later sent us to kind America to be adopted. After we crossed the ocean we were put on a train. We were happy to think we were far, far from the horrible war. Suddenly there was a crash. The train was smashed to pieces. We were back in the war. "'It's the Germans! They're destroying America as they did France,' I cried to Jean. And at that strange people came. Their talk sounded like that of the Germans in our ruined village. I was frightened. I took Jean and we fled in the night, far, far!"
