Case is Decided in Favor of Defendant

The case of the state against the Painless Withers Dental company, involving charges of selling stock without a license in violation of the Blue Sky law, was dismissed by Judge Troup at the cost of the state. Several other corporations, which had disposed of stock in a similar manner, were interested in the case and were represented by their at-

During the heat of the argument it was announced by the attorney general that he represented the interests of the Dental society and local dentists, as well as the state. Attorneys for the defense then stated that other dentists would not be adverse to seeing so "vigorous and original a competitor," as Dr. Withers denied the right to practice.

The state claimed that violation of the Blue Sky law constituted a breach of law warranting the court to revoke the charter and dissolve the corporation. It was shown that a brief had been filed by the attorney general's office in another instance showing that the Blue Sky law was unconstitutional.

This necessary task on which Bobby had stumbled had made the thicket less congenial than the house. As he walked back he forecasted with a keen apprehension his approaching ordeal. It would, doubtless be more difficult to endure than Howell's experiment over Silas Blackburn's body in the old room. Could he witness the definite imprisonment of his grandfather in a narrow box; could he watch the covering earth fall noisily in that bleak place of silence without displaying for Robinson the guilt that impressed him more and more? A strange man appeared, walking from the direction of the house. His black clothing, relieved only by narrow edges of white cuffs between the sleeves and the heavy mourning gloves, fitted with colemn harmony into the landscape and Bobby's mood. Such a figure was appropriate to the Cedars. Bobby stepped to one side, placing a screen of dead foliage between himself and the man whose profession it was to mourn. He emerged from the forest and saw again the leisurely weaving of the smoke shroud above the house. Then his eyes were drawn by the restless movements of a pair of horses, standing in the shafts of a black wagon at the court entrance, and his ordeal became like a vast morass which offers no likely path yet whose crossing is the price of salvation.

He was glad to see Graham leave the court and hurry toward him. "I was coming to hunt you up. Bobby. The minister's arrived. So has Doctor Groom. Tverything's about ready."

"Doctor Groom?" "Yes. He used to see a good deal of your grandfather. It's natural enough he should be here."

Bobby agreed indifferently. They walked slowly back to the house. Graham made it plain that his mind was far from the sad business ahead. "What do you think of Paredes stops nasty discharge or nose runcoming back as if nothing were wrong?" he asked. "He ignores what happened yesterday.
