Government of Brazil Must Fix Price of Food So the Poor Can Live

Living costs in Brazil have reached a point where the government has been obliged to consider restricting exports, according to information received by the bureau of labor statistics, Department of Labor.

The president of Brazil has authorized a food administration, consisting of one commissioner and the necessary assistants, to investigate the food supplies, costs of production and handling, selling prices, and means for improving conditions through government control. Actual government handling of the crops is possible if it becomes necessary. One of the plans of the administration is to assist workmen's co-operative organizations in every way.

Food prices have advanced greatly in Rio de Janeiro and the working classes have found great difficulty in getting enough to eat. Prices of domestic products have advanced just as have imported articles and in some instances the percentage of increase is almost as great.

To those familiar with the work of Charles W. Hawthorne, the well known instructor at the Art League and the summer school at Provincetown, Mass., his "The Story Bible" is a surprise. Very different from his other work, it is done in glaze, that method of painting the picture without color, grinding it down and then putting the color thinly over it, which was used by the old masters and which so many modern artists are experimenting with. This picture is more broad, sincere and simple and pleasing in color than his other work.

Singularly Joseph Israels is represented by a portrait, for he always painted genre. Fritz Thaulow, the great painter of water in motion, has a fine example. He did such fine work until he signed a contract to produce so many pictures a year at a stated price and could do it no longer. There is a fine Albert P. Ryder, "The Tempest," which is not apt to be liked in a temporary exhibition, as one must live with a Ryder to love it. A fine memorial exhibition of this, one of the greatest of our artists, was held at the Metropolitan museum in New York last winter.

An excellent example of the unfortunate Blacklock, who passed his last years in an insane asylum, is shown. There is a very fine Daubigny, especially interesting just now from the subject, "Late Afternoon on the Oise." There is a very nice Charles H. Davis, but not so good as others of his which have been shown here.

Gari Melchers, the great painter of chintzes, is represented by an unusually good example, and there is a similar picture by Frederick Frieseke, "Moonlight Surf," by Paul Dougherty, the prize winner, in his usual manner, though cold in color and done with palette knife or thumb nail as well as brush. "Sun and Shadow," by Frank W. Benson of Boston is unusually fine.

"Buds and Blossom," by Daniel Garber, is in Japanese style, now gaining interest in New York. There are also pictures for those who care for the lighter side of art.

The exhibition is in charge of Mrs. Ward Burgess, whose hanging of the pictures in the Franco-Belgian exhibition two years ago attracted such favorable comment from those familiar with the eastern shows.

By MRS. LETA MOORE MEYER

THE sixty oil paintings which the Omaha Society of Fine Arts exhibits for ten days at the Fontenelle, are mostly of a very serious and sincere nature.

The nine Monticellis afford the student an unusually good opportunity for study. All done in his distinctive manner of brown, raw umber and mystery, they show two distinct phases of his work and the transition between them. He was a contemporary of the Barbizon school in France about the time when it was considered an iron bound rule that all landscapes must be first sketched in brown, raw umber and the lights only thickly painted in, the explosion of which theory gained Constable his fame.

The two pictures, "The Peacock Garden" and "The Pet Dove," show a half-hearted conformity to the rule and were evidently done in his earlier years. He gets away from it, however, in the stilled and somewhat stilted and timid "The Lark," and still further in "Feeding the Chickens," when he was beginning to use the thick impasto characteristic of most of his work. The other four pictures are done in the usual style of his maturity.

The two styles of George Inness can also be studied. The "Roman Campagna," is done in the stilled photographic style of the days when he was a soldier in the civil war and when he was considered hopeless as an artist. "Moonrise" is Inness at his best and is done in the scumbled brown method above mentioned, with the lights painted in heavily and gives a beautiful effect of night and its beauty.

Robert Henri, instructor at the Art League in New York and one of the most popular of our teachers, especially among the new cult that believes in finishing a six-foot canvass in one day, is also well represented by two, for him, very small portraits, also his transitional style. The large, breezy pictures of his earlier years, disregarding drawing and structure and which expressed his inspiring enthusiastic personality have given place to those painted mostly of the Indians of the southwest, accurate and right in structure and drawing and technique but rather lifeless and wooden. The two here shown are evidently between the two and possess the virtues of both. "Irish Girl," particularly has a fine feeling of the body and she has very successfully made use of the old method of scraping out the dress entirely. These two pictures are unfortunately hung in the hall where one cannot get much distance on them. Some years ago the French government bought one of Mr. Henri's pictures for the Luxembourg and it is said the price was $40,000. He is one of the most interesting characters in New York art circles. Intensely sincere and independent, he has more than once created a sensation on New York exhibition juries.
