

BURGLARS AND ROBBERS STILL VERY BUSY HERE

Eleven Holdups and Robberies Reported in Last Two Days, With No Offenders Caught.

The activities of burglars and highwaymen in Omaha continued throughout Saturday and Sunday.

Yeggen forced an entrance to the grocery store conducted by J. Kadiner, 2404 Fort street, wrecked the safe, stole $50 in Liberty bonds and war saving stamps and $250 in cash.

Entrance was gained by breaking a plate glass window in front of the store. Dynamite is believed to have been used to blow open the safe, the door of which was carried across the room by the force of the explosion.

Clothing valued at $160 was stolen from Mrs. Brooks, Sterling apartments, Sixteenth and Yates streets, by burglars who gained entrance by climbing down a fire escape and through a rear window.

Mrs. H. Adler, who lives in the Tenth apartments, reported that $625 in cash was stolen from her rooms by two men, who represented themselves to be from Orchard & Wilhelm.

Mrs. C. F. Neilson, 3330 Corby street, was assaulted by two negro men in front of an unoccupied grocery store in the vicinity of her home.

Using a pass key sneak thieves entered through the front door of the residence of B. A. Chappell, 1921 Pinkney street, and stole cut glass and silver valued at $50.

The glass in a front window of the residence of A. Rosen, 416 South Tenth street, was broken out by burglars, who took a number of household articles, a list of which the police were told would be furnished later.

Clothing valued at $100 was stolen from the residence of Mrs. Elizabeth Engel, 1824 Capitol avenue. Thieves ransacked the house during the absence of the occupants.

Otis Williams, 2615 Parker street, reported the loss of an overcoat from his home. The garment, which was taken by sneak thieves, was valued at $15.

The Troy laundry reported the loss of a bundle of laundry from one of their wagons. The package, said to have been valued at $15, was taken from a delivery wagon while standing in front of the laundry at 2117 Cuming street.

Thieves forced an entrance to the residence of Ed Bryant, 2817 North Twenty-seventh street, and stole clothing valued at $115. A rear window was broken, through which the thieves entered and escaped with their booty.

"VIRTUOUS WIVES"

CHAPTER XXII.

For a moment, before the unexpected vision of the master of the house, Dawson had an impulse to retreat blindly, in the desperate need to steady his nerves.

"How do you, Mr. Forrester?" "Oh, how are you?" said Forrester, who gave him a short look, an abrupt hand-shake, and began to struggle out of his coat.

"We've just been practicing the steps for the minuet. Amy's going to be stunning."

"The what?" "The minuet—the Versailles fete, you know."

"Ah, yes." "We're counting on your being there."

"Kind of you." Dawson felt that Forrester noticed his embarrassment and that being an intimate of the household demanded that he should say something more.

"How are things in Mexico?" "What?" "Conditions all right in Mexico?" he continued, shifting to the other foot.

"About the same." "Staying long?" "Don't know."

"Amy'll be surprised." Forrester gave no answer. To Dawson the door seemed miles away. He swallowed hard, mumbled something and departed, cursing the impulse which had made him tell an unnecessary lie.

Amy was content with herself. It seemed to her that even Andrew, had he been present, would have been proud of her. She knew that she was willing to punish herself by losing the boy's devotion, but she had handled the situation so firmly, with kindness, that he could have no doubt of her loyalty. Moreover, she had gained in his eyes, and the memory of the new adoration she had seen in his face gave her a spiritual satisfaction which she thoroughly believed she deserved.

As for the effect on Tody—at this moment in her life she was skeptical of the great passion of love which novelists harped upon and newspapers dressed up in sensational colors. To her, it was a question of propriety, comfort, and convenience such as the emotion that made her seek strength from her husband; a logical thing, born of respect and admiration rather than of any uncontrollable passion. She had never known its fever, its anguish of desire, its obsessing specter, and she doubted its existence.

"It was the only sensible way to handle him—the dignified way," she repeated, glancing at the sofa. His card had fallen by the sofa. She picked it up smiling and was about to tear it up, when Morley rushed in.

"Beg pardon, madam, but Mr. Forrester is down stairs." "Mr. Forrester?" she said, vaguely alarmed by the sense of precipitation in the maid's entrance.

"Yes, madam, I was passing in the hall and I heard his voice talking to Mr. Dawson. I'm certain of it!" Below, the outer door slammed. She remembered suddenly that Morley was waiting here, and angrily aroused herself.

"There must be some mistake—go and see," she said abruptly. The maid departed. She was alone, Tody's card in her fingers. She noticed it, and started to hide it in the front of her negligee.

"No, no—I have done nothing wrong—why should I feel like this?" she said impatiently, her ear strained to catch the slightest sound. The next moment she heard the powerful fall of her husband's step on the stairs.

"Why Andrew, it isn't possible!" she cried, going to him with outstretched hands. "I was called up rather suddenly," he began, then he glanced at her, her negligee, and he stopped short. The face, already set in nervous irritation, became all at once hard, concentrated, and bitter. Before this look she recoiled as though he had stepped out from behind a mask. In a prophetic flash, she saw what he might become if he should cease to love her, and seized with horror she cried, warding him from her.

"Oh, Andrew, don't look at me like that!" He continued to look at her. His eyes blazed and the color went out of his face. He turned, closed the door and said:

"I met that young Dawson in the hall? She was too overcome with the shock to her heart to comprehend what he was saying. She nodded, her eyes blurred with tears, wounded as a child is wounded. And I have a second disagreeable experience to find you in such a costume," he said, his eyes running over the soft negligee which wrapped her little body about as the wreath of some heavy incense. "If you choose to receive me at such hours in your private salon, I object to your dancing in a dressing gown."

"Dancing?" she said, startled back into attention. "Exactly." "You are out of your senses, Andrew!" she cried, and her modesty was so offended that her cheeks blushed in indignant reproach. "You don't think that of me! No, no; that is impossible."

"One moment!" He stood staring at her, his fingers playing like lightning. "Do I understand you to say that you have not been dancing with Mr. Dawson?" She drew herself up and faced him with a flash of anger. "Certainly not."

"That is rather more serious, then," he seemed to her himself saying. Something roared in his temples; a rush of water closing over him. Mr. Dawson himself, five minutes ago, told me that he had been rehearsing the minuet you are to dance with him!" "He told you that!" she cried aghast. "Exactly that." He waited, torn by all the blinding forces of jealousy, his eyes never leaving her face. After a moment he said imperiously, "Well?"

"She could not assemble her wits. She felt trapped, beating out her wings against a cage, convicted by appearances. "But this is awful!" she thought, shrinking before the ugliness of the situation. "He'll believe anything of me, and I am innocent!" "Well?" she heard his voice repeat. She glanced down at the card which was crumpled by the action of her fingers—her fingers that were moist with perspiration—and she said slowly:

MAYOR'S MARKET PUT UNDER FIRE BY THE COUNCIL

Commissioners Bring Up Side Issues Which Tend to Delay the Proposed Project.

Mayor Smith stood yesterday like Horatius at the bridge, defending his pet municipal market ordinance against "death" and "chloroforming." Finally he secured passage of section 7 of the ordinance, which in effect makes a monopoly of the municipal market by prohibiting gardeners from selling their produce anywhere else than on the municipal market to be established at Fifteenth and Davenport streets.

The vote was only 4 to 3, on this section. Then rose Commissioner Zimman and declared: "I am in favor of a municipal market, but I would be willing to wager my salary for 1919, that the market, if established at Fifteenth and Davenport streets, will be an absolute failure as far as relief for the consumer is concerned."

"I am in favor of a municipal market, but I would be willing to wager my salary for 1919, that the market, if established at Fifteenth and Davenport streets, will be an absolute failure as far as relief for the consumer is concerned."

"Where is the Money." "Where do you propose to get this $15,000, Mr. Mayor?" asked Commissioner Ure.

"We appropriated it in the miscellaneous fund when we formed the budget," declared the mayor. "No, we didn't; we merely appropriated $7,500," said Mr. Ure.

"Oh, well, we'll find the money," said the mayor. "Well, I'm opposed to getting up plans for all kinds of things on that principle," said Mr. Ure.

Commissioner Falconer, who was named in the mayor's ordinance to manage the market, declined the honor. "I am willing to take the hot end of this if there is one," declared Mayor Smith as he offered a resolution putting the market under management of his department.

"I certainly don't want it," said Mr. Falconer. And all the commissioners voted joyously and enthusiastically "aye" on the amendment to put it under the mayor's management.

Then came Commissioner Ringer and attacked the location at Fifteenth and Davenport streets. "Why should we put it there, where no green groceries have ever been sold?" he asked.

"Because the city owns the land," replied the mayor. "The worst possible reason in the world," declared Commissioner Ure. "I know a man who built a $200,000 building on a location because he owned the land and he would have made three times as much money if he had sold that land and bought a better location for his building."

Want Better Location. Commissioner Ringer moved the appointment of a committee of the mayor and two others to report on a better location for the market. The mayor opposed this, but finally the mayor and Commissioners Ure and Towl were appointed.

Council several days ago ordered the removal of the building from the Fifteenth and Davenport site.

ROSE AND SLACK ESCAPE TWICE FROM OFFICERS

Elude Omaha Police and Escape from Train While a Deputy Sheriff Sleeps.

Confusion in the city detective department was responsible for the first getaway of Henry Slack and Carl Rose, wanted for burglary in Omaha. A sleeping deputy sheriff was responsible for their second getaway Sunday morning when they jumped, while handcuffed, from a train near Corning, Mo., and are now roaming somewhere in the fields between that place and St. Joseph, Mo.

When detectives arrested Pearl Wilson, 1903 Capitol avenue, on the night of January 27 and found two suitcases full of stolen revolvers and jewelry in her home, Slack and Rose were concealed in a closet adjoining the hallway. It was learned that the detectives were ordered to be on the lookout for the boys at the time. The detectives were unaware that Slack and Rose were in the Wilson home.

The detectives failed to investigate further evidence of the boys' presence in the house when they discovered their caps and overcoats covering the suitcases in the hallway. When the detectives left the house, Slack and Rose, breathing sighs of relief, left the house and took an early train to St. Joseph, Mo.

The revolvers and jewelry found in the possession of Pearl Wilson comprised part of the loot from the Brodsky Jewelry store, Thirteenth and Broadway.

The best thing to use is just plain mulsumed coconut oil, which is pure and entirely greaseless. It's very cheap, and beats the most expensive soaps or anything else all to pieces. You can get this at any drug store, and a few ounces will last the whole family for months.

Simply moisten the hair with water and rub it in, about a teaspoonful is all that is required. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, cleanses thoroughly, and rinses out easily. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and is soft, fresh looking, bright, fluffy, wavy, and easy to handle. Besides, it loosens and takes out every particle of dust, dirt and dandruff.—Adv.
