Central Division Red Cross Is Making Plans to Keep Motor Corps at Work

The value of the Red Cross motor service has been thoroughly demonstrated as a peace activity as well as in times of military and civil emergencies, according to the Central division, in a letter just received by the Omaha chapter. The letter states:

"In some localities the activities are even greater at present than before the armistice, due to returning wounded, debarcation and the proximity of any hospitals, but in all localities the peace possibilities of service are with us, as they will continue to be.

"There are large opportunities in connection with civilian organizations. There hospitals full of patients who would derive quite as much benefit by and be grateful for airings as our convalescent soldiers. Visiting Nurses are always with us and their work is more than doubled in efficiency if they can go from place to place in an automobile. The same is true of all charity workers. Many other opportunities will suggest themselves to the local corps. "In the meantime the war is not yet over and we can help to alleviate its effects for sometime to come."
