On the Farm. By Dixie McCollom, Age 12, Graham, Neb.

Dear Busy Bees: I'm a little girl 12 years old. I have lived in a large city all my life until last year; my parents moved to Nebraska on one of grandpa's farms; it was all new and strange to me, especially the country school, but I like my school and teacher fine, and the children also. We have chickens and cows and a little calf. I like to hunt in the eggs.

I have a sister, Margaret, aged 14 years, and a baby sister, Virginia, aged 3. I'm in the seventh grade. I like the farm, but sometimes I get lonesome for some of my old friends in the city.

Many women in England are now engaged in the hand-made toy industry.

My Heart and My Husband Adele Garrison's New Phase of Revelations of a Wife

The Question That Lillian Asked Madge.

It was not until hours after my assurance to Lillian that I would stay until Robert Savarin's sister arrived that we had opportunity for any conversation other than the hurried words exchanged in the battle for the artist's life.

The death-like swoon continued and the physician's face, I fancied, was graver than usual when he left the house after his second visit.

"I shall be in constant touch with my office, so that I can hasten, here if you should see any change," he said to Lillian, "and I shall be back anyway, in three hours. I trust by that time I shall be able to secure you a nurse."

But it was not until the morning of the next day that the eagerly expected nurse arrived, a slight middle-aged woman with fast graying hair, a mouse-like creature, who yet appeared to have an efficient personality behind her quiet meekness. It was but a few moments after her arrival before she summoned me.

"Can you not persuade Mrs. Underwood to leave here and lie down?" she asked. "I am afraid I shall have two patients on my hands instead of one if she doesn't take care of herself."

Her voice was thin, her manner shy, but I caught a decisive note underlying her little speech, and it didn't need her professional opinion to tell me that Lillian was on the verge of collapse.

My friend's eyes were dull, glazed looking, and she swayed against me when I went to her side, and, taking her hands, pulled her to her feet. "Come with me, dear," I whispered, holding her tightly. She straightened herself with an effort, turned to the nurse.

"You will, of course, let me know immediately, if there is the slightest change," she said imperiously.

The Nurse Agrees. I thought for a moment she meant to dispute Lillian's dictum. But the next minute she had acquiesced quietly.

"You may rest without worry on that score, Mrs. Underwood. I shall call you at any change."

Lillian turned her face to mine without another word, and I felt her lean upon me heavily as I guided her across the hall to the library in which there was a couch that could be converted into a most comfortable bed at a moment's notice, upon which, in fact, I had dozed when I wasn't helping Lillian.

"You are not to speak," I told her severely, "until I have made you comfortable."

I took off her outer clothing and her shoes, wrapped a warm bathrobe about her and tucked her into the bed I had made ready. Then I put hot water bags at her feet and back, for I saw that she was shivering with cold, and that her pulse was sluggish and faint.

She caught my hand as I finished tucking her up and started for the door with the intention of directing Betty to prepare something hot and nourishing for her.

"Do You Think—" "Wait, Madge," she said faintly. "When—did—you—tell me Mrs. Cosgrove would be here?" "Not for three hours," I returned. "You know the trains are very few at this time of the year."

"I know. But—I must talk to you before she gets here. If I don't I shall go mad."

"If you will promise me to go to sleep after I have brought you something hot to drink I will let you talk to me as soon as you have swallowed it," I returned, smiling down at her, although I felt far more like weeping at sight of her blanched, suffering face.

"I promise," she said faintly, and I hurried Betty in the preparation of the hot, nourishing potion as that ponderous person had not been hurried in years.

"If it wasn't for Miss Lillian I'd jest tak mah fut in mah hand an' clar out ob heah," I heard her mutter, as I left the kitchen. "Hain't got no patience at tall wif sech whiffets traipsin' rou'n' mah kitchen."

But little recked I of Betty's moods as I hastened up the stairs the bowl of steaming liquid in my hand. I guessed something of the fear that if she did not relieve her tortured nerves by confiding in some one, we might, indeed, as the nurse put it, "have another patient on our hands."

I held her against me as she obediently swallowed every drop of the delicious mixture Betty had prepared, laid her down gently when she had finished, and knelt by her side with her hands closely clasped in mine.

"Now," I said softly, "I'll give you just ten minutes." She looked up at me with eyes full of horror.

"Madge, tell me," she whispered hoarsely, "do you think Robert has found Harry and killed him?" (Continued Tomorrow.)
