Wit and judgment often are at strife,
Though meant each other's aid, like man and wife.

Heart Beats

By A. K.

There are vagrant winds
And cyclones—
Some that scorch
And some that freeze—
Love lives violently
And then dies silently
Under either or Any of these.
Love is more delicate
Than a sensitive flower—
More fragile than
A wind-blown reed.
Ah, be not harsh
Or coarse—
Or cruel—lovers—
For Love has died
In a single hour.
Fan it lightly—
Gently—
Lovers—
You who wish
To hold Love long—
It keeps burning
By the fanning
Of a subtle
Soft, cool breeze—
While the swift
High winds
Of fervor
Soon exhaust Love's
Wildest flame.
Keep these high, swift winds
From touching
Cupid's sparks—
'Twould make them burn—
Flames boil recklessly
Love's vintage
And then leave
Charred memory
Naught but dregs
And bitter lees.
Love's gray ashes
Are but ashes—
Bellows could not
Make them flame.

"How when Love is over Even the lover understands."
—SELAHI!

"Swift" Adopted Every Child On 38th

He Dined and Supped and Lunched With Each in Turn and Then He Settled Down.

Swift, this Scotch collie with the soft brown eyes, wanted a family. For two long years he searched for a home where there were children to care for, and finally adopted the five Berggren children as his own. He adapted them so completely and decidedly that after eight months there was nothing to do but to adopt him, search for his lawful owner and buy him. Thus his persistence and lovable nature won for Swift, the collie, a place in the E. J. Berggren family, 319 North Thirty-eighth avenue.

Not that Swift was a stranger in the vicinity. For two years, because he did not care for his own home, he simply adopted the community in general. Each little boy and girl loved him, and more remarkably, their fathers and mothers did likewise. With no partiality he spent the day now with one, and now with another, of his little friends—stayed for "lunch" and "spent the night" behind the door in the kitchen. Being an unusually well-matured dog, he never ventured outside the kitchen in any home.

But the Berggren children came—five of them—and after two years' experience in community living, he knew that here must be his future home. Five children and he liked them all. They had little to say, especially he liked Jimmy, who is one of the nonessentials in the life of a wanderer and gypsy dog. Every morning, with soap and water, Jimmy and Swift battle with the day's accumulation of dust, and he endures it with a resigned air, as much as to say, "Absolute perfection can no man—or dog—expect."

But some training was needed. He had to be convinced that the pet rabbits were not to be chased, and now he carefully watches all the little bunnies, and when one ventures over the yard limits he gently brings him back in his mouth. He no longer barks so viciously at automobiles. He does exactly what is told him, whether it is to go upstairs, in the basement or whether it is to watch little Elizabeth, his youngest charge.

But jealous! Alas, the little green-eyed monster rules him. He refuses to allow any dog to be petted or admired or even to come into the yard. And unusual as it is for a collie, he is acknowledged leader of all of his "set." They don't dispute his throne in his adopted family.

The question of moving came; the family were to move to Denver but what of Swift? True it was that love beget love, in this case, for the affection was equal on both sides. This could go on and that could stay—Swift, their collie, must go. Or else they all must stay. And so it is that in the automobile which takes the Berggren family to Denver this summer, will be a big, beautiful, lovable collie, resting his head on his front feet, looking out into space as much as to say, "To how few people is it given to choose their own family."
