WOMAN'S SECTION OF THE BEE

Men and Women Have Lowered Morals

English Women Condemn One Sex as Much as Other for Immorality.

London, July 1.—Justice Darling's remarks about the moral deterioration of women during wartime has produced heated conversations in many homes. Lady Muir-Mackenzie expressed the greatest indignation when asked for her views on the subject.

"Naturally, if you walk along the Strand at night you must expect to see behavior which you would rather not see. But, in these things, is it fair to condemn one sex to the exclusion of the other?"

Moral Sense Still High. "But Justice Darling speaks in altogether exaggerated terms. Personally I have no knowledge of the moral lowering of the moral sense; I have seen no signs of it."

Dr. Ethel Bentham was also emphatic in denying that any loosening of the moral sense is confined to women. "I do know," she stated, "that there is a far greater instability in both men and women than there was, but to say that women have morally deteriorated is to go much too far."

"I have a good many opportunities of judging these things, and I have met this lack of balance. But I have found it in men quite as often as in women. It always happens after a war. But I do not think there has been any serious hauling down of moral standards."

"Simply amounts to this—that if women want to kick over the traces they have more opportunities now than they used to have; their conduct is more open. That is all. Generally speaking, I think that women have proved themselves to be helpful citizens in wartime; they have come through the ordeal very well."

Less Particular Now. Mrs. Will Crooks made a thoughtful defense of her sex. "I admit," she said, "that none of us is quite so particular as before war. But from more familiar manners to a general lowering of morals is a long step."

"Women had to put aside their modesty for a time, but it was in the service of the country, and the need has now passed. Where there has been more freedom of morals it has been noticeable as much among men as among women, and for women there should be understanding rather than blame."

Women of all temperaments found themselves working under the roughest conditions, side by side with men, in every type of factory. It is not to be wondered at if some of them lost their reticence and allowed themselves a greater latitude in their behavior.

French Girls Camp Via American Plan In Vacation Time. Summer camps on the "American plan" will be a brand new feature of vacation life for French business girls this summer.

The news comes from Miss Mary Dingman of Paterson, N. J., leader of French work for the American Y. W. C. A.

Three camping centers have been taken by the association and will be attended by a big proportion of the 15,000 girls who are members of the Y. W. C. A.'s clubs in various industrial centers in France.

The camps are in the northern coast districts and will carry out-of-doors recreational programs new to French girls.

Heart Beats By A. K.

Trudging to school On tired little feet— Day after day In the cold and sleet— Night after night Home again With book strap bound Round volumes of thought And findings of wise old men. Dreading to miss A single day Blinding our young eyes By man-made light — At night — To win in the final test. Ah me! How little we know After all this struggle Of the whys of Life. None of us learn Of God's great plan Or the secrets Beyond the sight. We've finished our books With credit marks But our eyes still stare Into the silent dark With never a peek at Fate. We've the great out-doors And the Universe To be studied and studied And then rehearsed. Why! There so much for each And all of us In this wonderful world To do That our little thought trains
