My Heart and My Husband

ADELE GARRISON'S New Phase of
"Revelations of a Wife"

The Quest Begins.

Don't be frightened, Mrs. Graham, we are going to stop in the middle of this block and walk the rest of the way. The house is in the next block."

Allen Drake's voice was solicitously kind, but I resented the protectively patronizing air with which he spoke. It was the manner a man would adopt toward an old woman, an extremely young one or one totally inexperienced in worldly ways.

Surely, I said to myself hotly, I had not acquitted myself so badly in the piece of his work with which I had been associated during the war that he should make so little of my worldly wisdom now. At that time he had praised the work upon the important mysterious code which I had done, although I suspected that he had done so grudgingly, and that he had been compelled to admiration because of the remarkable memory which some freak of nature supplemented by my mother's training, had given me.

But before I left Lillian's I had resolved to emulate the well-known oyster in the matter of expressing either opinions or emotion, so I confined my response to a laconic sentence.

"I am not frightened," I said indifferently. "This Way!"

"That's good," Mr. Drake was equally casual. He had already given the signal to the taxi driver, and the man drew up the car at the curb in front of a dark building. In fact, the whole block was but dimly lighted, and as Mr. Drake assisted Lillian and me out of the taxi cab the whole atmosphere of the locality seemed reeking with mystery—a fit setting for any sort of melodrama.

"Wait here for us," Mr. Drake directed the driver. "We may be 15 minutes, we may be a great deal longer, but I want to find you right here when we get back. No scouting around the corner for you."

"All right, boss," the man rejoined, good-naturedly, but I wondered if he did not inwardly resent Mr. Drake's rather cavalier manner.

My irritation at Mr. Drake's air was fast becoming an obsession, one which troubled me guiltily, for I could not forget that his very presence with us meant that he had expended valuable time and skill in my service, was continuing to give both. I suppose the nervous tension under which I was laboring was partly responsible for my capriciousness, but the fact remained that I was rapidly reaching a point where I feared I might openly betray my feeling.

"This way!" Mr. Drake put a guiding hand on Lillian's arm, another on mine, and we walked in silence down the street to the corner.

Into the House.

As we reached it Mr. Drake turned abruptly toward a jutting doorway of a deserted office building, where I saw two men standing, the one farthest away from us, a furtive, slinking figure, whom I instinctively would have feared if I had met him alone.

The other man, whose type I had seen frequently when I was assisting Lillian in the secret service work, stepped out into the street as Mr. Drake turned toward him.

"All right, Watkins?" Mr. Drake asked in a low tone.

"Everything O. K., sir," the man replied.

"Good! Wait here for five minutes, then come to No. 237, the apartment building halfway down the block. The entrance door will be unlocked, and you walk up the stairs—don't take the elevator—until you reach the third floor. There is a corner there, where the stairway turns, that you can't miss seeing. Stand there—you'll be practically safe from observation—until you hear me speak your name. Then bring your lad up. If anybody questions you, flash your police card or give 'em any stall you can get away with."

"I'll manage." The man's voice was full of quiet self-confidence.

"All right then. So long." Mr. Drake returned, and we turned the corner and walked to the door of the tall apartment building which bore the number 237.

It was rather a forbidding looking place, but its interior had an attempt at ornateness, and there was the usual combination elevator boy and telephone operator sprawled at his ease before a switchboard.

He sprang up with alacrity, however, when he caught sight of Mr. Drake. From his manner I deduced that the two had seen each other before.

"Take us up to the third floor directly," Mr. Drake commanded, "and remember what I told you about that entrance door."

Amelia E. Barr, Novelist.

Despite the fact that the late Amelia E. Barr left an estate of but a few hundred dollars, she is known to have earned a large amount of money with her pen. Few American novelists, in fact, have met with greater success from a financial viewpoint than did Mrs. Barr. During her long and active career she wrote a total of nearly 100 novels. While no one of them created a literary sensation, all of them met with a fair measure of success and their sale yielded the author a steady and substantial income during a period of many years.

The first woman pastor to be licensed in New Brunswick is Miss Esther I. Clark, a graduate of Acadia university, who has accepted the offer of the United Baptist congregation at Grangeville to become pastor of their church.

Reiteration is the Keynote of Publicity

I have been told; however, it suits the purpose of our story today. No stronger reason for your patronage of these July Sales can be given than those with which we started.

Scarcity of merchandise make any merchandise desirable. Advancing prices makes anything bought at present prices a bargain. We are offering many lines at a reduction from former prices.
