

FATE OF COUNTY RECORDS RESTS WITH GOVERNOR

Special Session Only Hope for Restoration of Court House—No Other Way to Get Money.

Though four days have passed since the consultation of county officials with Governor McKelvie and Attorney General Davis in County Attorney Shotwell's office regarding the calling of a special session of the legislature, no word has been received regarding this contemplated action.

A special session is considered imperative to get funds to rebuild the court house and restore the county records, and county officials declare they cannot understand the governor's delay in calling the legislature together.

They are waiting in hourly hope of word that the governor will call the session, though at the conference he did not seem to be inclined to do so.

Only Way to Get Money. "That is the only way to get the money so badly needed," declared Sophus Nebbe, chairman of the board of county commissioners.

Mr. Nebbe declared that if the proposition for $1,000,000 bonds to restore the court house and records were submitted to the vote of the people it would likely fail to carry.

At the special election, November 4, he said, "the people will be asked to vote $5,000,000 school bonds, $2,000,000 sewer bonds and $100,000 jail bonds. If you add $1,000,000 or more bonds for rebuilding the court house, especially with the spirit that is abroad now, I have serious doubts whether it would be carried.

Resolutions expressing indignation at any attempt to criticize the city administration, whether in newspapers, on the stage or elsewhere, have been passed by the West Side Women's Christian Temperance union, as follows:

Whereas: The West Side W. C. T. U. utterly deprecates the events of last Sunday's riot, and are heartily sympathetic with the administration of law and order.

And as loyal citizens of this city, we are against publications of articles in newspapers and theatrical performances tending to ridicule our city officials and make a mockery of the prohibition law.

Benjamin Killman and Commodore Louis De Beaumont will accompany Major Glidden. The committee will be given a luncheon at the Chamber of Commerce by a group of representative business men, who will discuss arrangements for the around the world fight.

My Heart and My Husband ADELE GARRISON'S New Phase of "Revelations of a Wife"

The Question That Tormented Madge. As my husband's lips sought mine in a long kiss of reconciliation there came to me in a flash of illuminating understanding the realization of what it had cost Dicky's stubborn pride to come back to me after the determined stand he had taken concerning my refusal to tell him the reason for my emotion over the newspaper the morning after Milly Stockbridge's death.

With a sudden reckless fear of consequences I resolved to emulate his generosity. I would at the first opportunity give him the information he had demanded.

Not that I meant to tell him the whole story of poor Milly Stockbridge's fiendish, unreasoning jealousy. Woman-like I made mental reservations in my contemplated revelation, for I feared the effect of his hearing the whole unpleasant tale. But I was sure that in the interval which must elapse before Dicky and I could be alone long enough for an extended confidential talk I could map out a story which would satisfy his wounded vanity at my reticence and yet leave untold the unpleasant details it was advisable he should not know.

I stirred in his arms, the clasp of which fairly hurt me, so rough and compelling was it, and put my lips against his ear.

"Dicky, dear," I whispered softly, "don't think you are the only one who is going to be so generous. I will tell you about that morning just as soon as we get a chance to be alone."

He held me off, looked at me smiling. "So there was something after all," he said quizzically. Then voice and face sobered suddenly.

"Please remember that I am not asking your confidence," he said quietly.

"I know," I said remorsefully, for there was that in his voice which told how sorely I had hurt him. "But I want to give it to you."

Why Does Dicky Color? He kissed me again, not roughly this time, but with infinite tenderness, then released me then picked up Junior, who crowded delightedly to be taken into "his father's strong arms."

"I believe the little beggar actually knows me!" he beamed, raising the baby high above his head.

"Of course he knows you," I returned, indignation in my voice at this implied doubt of my year-old baby's mental superiority.

Dicky laughed, his old, teasing laugh, which told me that whatever tension had been in our interview was gone. I settled my hat sedately, tucked into place some stray strands of hair.

"A bit rumpled, aren't you?" Dicky said slyly. "Never mind, Lil won't care."

The mention of one of my guests made me think a bit apprehensively of the others.

"Did you say the Fairfax girls were here?" I asked.

Did I fancy it or did Dicky color a bit beneath his tan? "Lillian is," he said. "Come down with Lillian Marion and me."

"Oh! Why didn't Edith come too?" I tried to make my voice express genuine regret and failed miserably. I gained the knowledge in the comprehending look that Dicky gave me.

"She had another engagement, something she couldn't break," he said, a bit evasively. "She sent her love, and I believe there is a little parcel for Junior from her in Lillian's keeping."

"How dear of her!" I exclaimed, and this time my tone was genuine, for I had a sudden flash of comprehending sympathy for the lonely girl who had stayed away from the birthday festivities of our baby.

Madge Understands. For I knew the reason she had not come to us was because she could not bear to see the domestic happiness of the man she loved so hopelessly, and because of my own joy I felt a sincere compassion for the woman thus shut away from happiness.

Dicky gave me a quick, almost furtive look, then, with Junior still in his arms, bent his head to mine.

"You're a darling Madge," he said with seeming irrelevance. "Now run along to your guests. I'm going to get acquainted with my son."

And, of course, womanlike, as I walked slowly toward the house and Lillian, I could not help torturing myself with the query: "Why should Dicky be so especially appreciative of any kindly expression of feeling upon my part toward Edith Fairfax?"
