Thirty Years a Noted Opera Singer

After 30 years of operatic work, during which time he has seldom sung less than three roles in a week, Signor Vittorio Arimondi, famous basso with the Chicago Opera company, is still in harness, and from all reports his voice is just as fresh as ever, and his health better. During his long career Mr. Arimondi claims that he has never sung a part that has been distasteful or in a cast where he has had any friction. "Good health," he says, "is the first thing a singer should possess, and to do that he or she cannot dissipate or keep late hours. Plenty of good exercise and plain, wholesome food is what prolongs life and makes one happy. A healthy body makes a clean mind. That is the only receipt I have or know." Mr. Arimondi has been known to American opera-goers nearly 15 years, being brought by Oscar Hammerstein. In New York, Philadelphia and Chicago he is looked upon as one of the leading bassos in the opera world, and no singer is more respected and loved by the public. As one of the critics call him, "Our Good Friend Arimondi." Mr. Arimondi made his debut at the age of 22, the opera being "Guarany," by Gouze, the noted Brazilian composer. When Verdi brought out "Falstaff," the noted composer, after hunting for months for a basso to create the part of Fistol, sent for Arimondi, who was then out of the country. His success in the part so pleased Verdi that he (Arimondi) was the first one congratulated at the conclusion of the first performance. In the cast were: Victor Morel, Pina Corsi, Adolina Stilli, Virginia Verini and others not known in this country. He was also chosen to sing the principal basso role at the famous Columbus festival, Genoa, in the opera, "Cristoforo Colombo." He sang six seasons at Covent Gardens, London; eight seasons in Petrograd and 12 in Moscow. He was first singer to utter a note in the Teatro Colon, Buenos Aires, the opera being "Aida," the conductor was Mancinelli.
