The women who has the greatest responsibilities and privileges as a school teacher is the grammar school teacher, perhaps the one in the sixth least discomfort and embarrassment to themselves and their comrades. Teachers above and below her have fewer subjects to teach and less trying pupils to teach them to, for in the lower grades children are not ent departments of the schools or Teachers above and below her have yet personalities, and by high school by men and women among the printime they are more settled and less cipals who have made themselves obstreperous. And it it always her boys the teacher tells you about first, her boys in whom she is the most interested. When you ask her why, she gives you many reasons. Some say that boys are fairer, some that they are easier to handle, while many of the older teachers admit that it is mostly sex attraction. But what-ever the reason, their exists between on which three different kinds of a teacher and her boys a sense of fertilizer have been used, and a comradeship, which is rarer where her girls are concerned. Must Teach Everything.

"You have to know everything to teach school in the grades nowa-days," said a sixth grade teacher the other day and it is literally true reading, spelling, composition and writing, to the sons of Italy, and countries further East as well as to sons of New England. She holds classes in geography or history and then teaches them the beginning of science. But her duties do not end with the printed page, for she must teach them to draw and to sing, the latter being especially difficult when a half dozen of the boys in the room, possess voices wavering between soprano and bass, voices which any throat specialists will assure you should never be used for Teachers nowadays encourage their pupils in the keeping of notebooks and in watching magazines and newspapers for clippings akin to what they are studying. They (at least some of them) encourage the children's social tendencies by giving them a 20-minute period once a week or once in two weeks, in which they may entertain her and one another in the way they like best, whether it be charades, recitations. conundrums or even sleight-of-hand performances, if one of their number happens to be particularly gifted. In a word, teaching which used to be a most formal process has now become very informal, so informal, and consequently enjoyable, that the average modern youngster is wrap-ped up in "school."

But while it might seem an easier task to carry a room full of young people through the five hours of a school day where there is less strict rule and regulation, it probably in the olden days of 'readin,' ritin' takes more will power and influence to make the day run smoothly than in the older days of "readin,' ritin' and 'rithmetic."

How It Feels to Face Class. full of faces vary as widely as do said one sixth-grade teacher, "they the personalities of the teachers like to tell you just what is going themselves. Some women, particu- on at home as they see it, and what books at once, preparing the subject larly the younger ones, feel as if they were holding a team of horses which must be kept under check and rein lest commotion or cause for laughter in the room results in a runaway. But that feeling wears away with experience. A capable but comparatively young teacher said the other day: "Many times you really don't expect that what you are about to say is going to 'go' and you are surprised at the smoothness with which with which your commands are obeyed." However, that easy and flexible manner of facing a class and laughing with them, while bringing them to order, is an accomplishment attained only as a result of years of teaching, say those who

Certain it is, that the conscious will power and force of personality are more strongly developed in school teachers than in other women, for where the mother of a family thinks her three children will drive her distracted, the teacher to whom she sends them for the most active of their waking hours, has 40 more just like them to manage. But a school teacher who loves truly her work and is devoting all of her mind to it, faces her room full of faces new in the fall and fresh every morning with a certain sense of expectancy of the clash and interchange of personalities to follow.

About Parents. One matter in which teachers differ widely is that of parents. Some women who are apparently successful and popular teachers, think that the parents of their boys and girls are blind and prejudiced and feel that the parents blame them for the children's shortcomings and failures, while other teachers assert strongly that one of the most delightful things about teaching school is your relations with the mothers and fath ers. "Every mother is fair enough to see that there must be something wrong with the child who does not measure up to the standards of the teacher, even though she cannot see the weakness herself" said one teacher who also declared that "Any teacher who does not establish sym-pathetic relations with the parents, is either all worn out, or gone stale n teaching-or else she is teaching school merely to earn a living."

A maneuver employed by teachers which seems to have successful re-sults is that of sending for the mother of a boy or girl who is proving refractory or doing poor work and talking the matter over. Mothers' clubs prove a splendid opportunity for teacher and parent to be-come acquainted. "But after all, you can learn more of the family history The sensations experienced by dif- from the child himself in five minferent teachers as they face a room utes than you could any other way,"

no time for school."

Does She Talk Shop? The more a school teacher studies that she may present facts attractively to her children, the more she is eager to know, so that further study through correspondence courses, summer school work and university extension classes is common, particularly among teachers. And the school teacher who loves her work rarely has any life except that of the schoolroom and its surroundings. Even if she foregoes talking shop outside, she is interest-ed mainly in learning more, always to know more being her ambition. "A school teacher knows too much," was the statement made by one of them the other day. "She is so well versed in practical knowledge of eyery kind and the ways and wherefores of things that she simply cannot take any pleasure in the company of a perfectly nice bookkeeper or stenographer who is geting half as much again salary as she is, but who knows nothing about years ago, still she has to think twice or three times before she goes to a dance or does appear to a dance or does a dance to a dance or does anything out of the customary routine of her life, until in the end she loses the desire. But after all, why should any wo man pine for the ordinary forms of amusement, when she has a class of hildren to watch and guide, who will dramatize "Robinson Crusoe," standing on the crest of the island alone while he surveys the horizon and remarks in blase tones, "Oh, dear, I have been on the island for 23 years without seeing any savages, but perhaps I haven't looked around enough. I will look again."

This is merely typical of the count-less little incidents full of humor and interest which come up in every day's work, the delightful flavor which comes from daily contact with human minds and souls in their greatest growing period. Teachers who love their profession and stick ing when they heard calls for "litto it through the years are the ablest cherished tradition of "plain living and high thinking." And they are did "step in" and as a result 41 neand high thinking. And they are satisfied to remain just teachers, like the little boy in the sixth grade the other day who did not raise his hand either when his teacher asked how many Catholics or how many Protestants there were in the room.
