

American Soldiers Attached to the American Military Mission in Berlin Taking a Sight-Seeing Trip Along the River Spree.
(Photographs Copyrighted by International Film Service)

"It's a Long Way to Berlin But They Got There." American Soldiers Attached to the American Military Mission in Berlin Pose for Their Photo at the Base of the Colossal Wooden Statue of Von Hindenburg.

Here is a Yankee Doughboy Convincing a Pretty German Fraulein That Sir Walter Raleigh Did Not Have a Monopoly When It Comes to Chivalry. This Photo Was Made on the River Spree Below Berlin Where the Yanks Are Often Seen in Company of German Girls. Fraternizing With the Enemy is Strictly Forbidden of Course, but the Good Book Says "Love Your Enemies" and Mr. Doughboy is Just Carrying Out Instructions.

Two Spreewald Girls Wearing Their National Costume Escorting a Repatriated German Soldier to His Home. The Soldier Has Just Returned From a French Prison Camp. Spreewald Is Located on the River Spree About Fifty Miles From Berlin.

American Officers and Enlisted Men Attached to the American Military Mission in Berlin on an Outing on the River Spree. An American Major is Shown Looking Pleasant in a German Sailor's Hat.

Guards Commanded by Minister of Defense Gustav Noske Are Still on Duty in the Streets of Berlin. No One Is Permitted to Leave or Enter the City Without Passes. This Photograph Shows a German Woman Showing Her Pass at a Control Post.

Guards Commanded by Minister of Defense Gustav Noske Are Still on Duty in the Streets of Berlin. Control Posts Have Been Established and no One Is Permitted to Pass From One Part of the City to Another Without Displaying Proper Credentials. The Photograph Shows a Berliner Having His Pass Examined by a Guard.