

DR. J. E. JENKINS ADDRESSES MEET OF WOMAN'S CLUB Declares Fair Sex Is Taking Its Place In the Great Movements of the Day.

A painting by Bert Feenan, brother of Miss Emma Feenan of the art department, Omaha Woman's club, was presented to the Americanization committee of the club, Miss Katherine Worley, director, at the opening meeting held Monday afternoon at the Y. W. C. A. The painting will be used as a prize for night school work in connection with Americanization. Miss Worley reported on activities of the Americanization workers saying that every agency which could advance the cause had been employed. "We have consulted with the board of education, have worked through the city mission, have used interpreters, utilized foreign newspapers, and have had the assistance of parish priests."

Mrs. John Haarman reported enthusiastically on art, literature and music at the Fairbury convention and Mrs. R. L. Frank gave a clever review of an address by Mrs. Frank Ambler Pattison of New Jersey on "Scientific Management in the Home."

To Endow Nursery Bed. Upon motion of Dr. Kathleen Sullivan of the health department, and approval of the directors, the club voted to endow a bed for the Day Nursery, which will open in Jacobs Hall early in December. Mrs. W. H. Hatteroth was made recording secretary, succeeding Mrs. James C. Dahlman, resigned. The program for the day was in charge of the parliamentary law department, Mrs. R. E. McKelvey, leader. It consisted of a MacDowell composition played by Miss Della Erickson, who was presented a bouquet of yellow chrysanthemums, and an address by Dr. J. E. Jenkins on "The Value of a Knowledge of Parliamentary Law."

"Women are coming to take their places in great movements of the day and also to effect laws of society and the structure of government," said Dr. Jenkins in opening. "It is not enough to have good intentions, but one must have sagacity as well in dealing with groups in deliberative law. Nor is right alignment sufficient; one must know when to make wise compromise. And as a last resort, familiarity with principles of parliamentary procedure are not a valuable weapon." To illustrate this point, the nomination of Woodrow Wilson, and the present situation in congress, were cited. End Greater Than Means. "After all, parliamentary law and practice are but means to ends and the end is far greater than the means. It is well to be acquainted with the means, but they are grasped with comparative ease if we see the gravity, the necessity for, and the sacredness of good legislation."

Sheriff Sells 25,000 Empty Beer Bottles for $400 at Auction

Twenty-five thousand empty beer bottles were sold at auction yesterday by Sheriff Mike Clark to Max Steinberg in the basement of the court house for $400. The bottles have been emptied in the last week by a force of deputy sheriffs under an order of the district court. They were taken from the premises of Anton Larson on West Center street in the summer of 1917 and later ordered confiscated.

This beer was stored outside of the Larsen home. The sheriff did not take a large amount of beer stored in Larsen's cellar, considering that he had the right to have this, as it was in his dwelling. Much of the beer was stolen after the riot from the vault in the basement of the court house where it was stored. Many holes were cut with wire nippers in the heavy wire netting of the vault and the bottles were then removed by reaching between the steel bars.

Says City Sold Him Potatoes, but Failed to Deliver Them

J. F. Reese, forty-ninth and Mason streets, complains that two and one-half bushels of potatoes bought and paid for November 6 at the city hall, where the mayor's department held a sale, had not been delivered when he addressed the following letter to The Bee Monday: "Eleven days ago, or, to be more exact on November 6, at the city hall my wife bought two and one-half bushels of potatoes, paying $4.50 for the same to be delivered the next day. They have never been delivered and all we get from city officials is promise of delivery tomorrow, but, tomorrow never comes. I am wondering if it will be the same way with the potatoes and if they will never come. Now this sale may have been only a little joke of some of the public jokers, but if such is the case, I fail to find $4.50 worth of fun in it."

My HEART and My HUSBAND Adele Garrison's New Phase of Revelations of a Wife

How Mother Graham "Disposed of" Major Grantland.

I have always prided myself upon my self-control, but every iota of it was shredded from me by the increasing pain, different from anything I had ever before experienced, which tore at my side after Major Grantland had put me down upon my bed. "Oh, what is it?" I gasped wildly, looking up at him in an unreasoning panic. He put out his hands and took mine in a strong grip. "Don't be frightened," he said. "I do not think it is dangerous, but I am afraid you have fractured a rib. The physician, of course, will be able to ascertain this point definitely when he arrives. But just now there is nothing for you except to be your intrepid, natural self."

My mother-in-law, who had busied herself with putting in order the trifles scattered upon my dressing table, gave one of her characteristic snorts. "Major Grantland," she said crisply, "if you have quite finished reassuring my daughter-in-law, perhaps you will be so kind as to let me attend to her. I must undress her and put her to bed. Please send the maid up as you go downstairs."

"Oh!" I exclaimed in a frenzy of humiliation at the insulting tone and words, "I am so sorry. It is shameful." "Don't give it another thought," he said in a low tone, pressing my hands slightly and laying them down upon the bed. Then he turned to my mother-in-law, and his words were as measured and cold as the dripping of an icicle. "Mrs. Graham must be moved as little as possible before the physician arrives. Movement is torture to her. Remove her shoes, cut her clothing wherever it is impossible to remove it without movement upon her part. Above everything keep her quiet until the physician comes."

His voice had the ring of one accustomed to command instant obedience and respectful attention. But those under his authority had been soldiers, not an irascible old woman. She threw back her head haughtily and assumed her most crushing grand dame manner. "You will perhaps pardon me, Major Grantland, if I remind you that I am the mother-in-law of Dr. Braithwaite, whose work in Paris attracted a good deal of favorable comment during the war. I was a member of his household for years and I do not need your advice or that of any other nonmedical man upon the proper procedure to follow with a possible fractured rib preceding the arrival of a physician."

A Puzzle. She was magnificent. I had to admit it, despite my resentment at her unjustified rudeness to Major Grantland. But I was startled to hear the officer laugh boyishly, for it was so odd and curious a transition from his ordinarily grave moods. But evidently he was sportsman enough to recognize the point she had scored against him. "Madam, I acknowledge with admiration your 'Parthian shot,'" he said, bowing in his awkward yet dignified manner. "I will await your pleasure as to the questions you wish to ask me downstairs. Good-afternoon."

He strode to the door, closed it behind him and I heard his footsteps going down stairs. I kept my eyes closed and waited in almost a nervous frenzy of apprehension for what Mother Graham would say. I was sure that she would make some caustic remark about the officer's carrying me upstairs, yet she had effectively thwarted my own protest. Usually I can follow her mental processes pretty accurately, but this was one of the times when she completely baffled me as to what her brain concepts might be.

My absolute astonishment may be imagined when her voice came to my ears with a softness and a gentleness that would make the traditional cooing dove hide her head in hopeless envy. "Is the pain so bad, child? But I know it must be. I had one once, myself. Now if that jackanapes of an officer had gone about his business when he got you up here, instead of palavering around, I would have had Katie up here and we would have had you as comfortable as you could be. Of course I couldn't stop the pain, but I could have gotten all these bothersome things off."

"Drat the men, anyway. There's not one of 'em has the sense of a grasshopper. And where in creation is that ape of a girl? He certainly must have told her to come up here, unless he's gone completely out of his seven senses, as I more than half believe."

And I wondered, worriedly, if there was a deeper meaning to her running diatribe against the officer than appeared on the surface. (Continued Tomorrow.)

A home by summer seas Don't wait for riches, or old age. At San Diego, California, any man who has won a competence may have his "cottage by the sea," his ocean view, his daily swim, and a home wreathed in year-round flowers and garlanded in perpetual green. In this modern city of 85,000 inhabitants, more homes and streets overlook bay and ocean than in any other city in America. Thousands of attractive residences above the downtown streets look out across the blue and silver bay, the white beaches and noble headlands, to the Coronado Islands of the Mexican Republic and the sea-rimmed horizon. From the nesting bungalows of Point Loma, facing bay and business city and the mountain sunrises, the decks of warships and merchantmen steaming in and out of harbor seem but a biscuit-toss away. Roses bloom everywhere in January as in June. There's sunshine more than 350 days each year, and all days are Spring days, in San Diego California Through Pullman service on the San Diego and Arizona Railway, in connection with the Rock Island and Southern Pacific, commences December 1, 1919. A delightful trip in winter months—through mild climate and new and interesting country.
