CLUBBING

A PERSONAL conversation with any of the leaders present in Omaha during sessions of the Nebraska State Teachers' association, revealed an anxiety over the shortage of teachers. "I have 200 calls on my desk for teachers, and cannot make a single nomination," said Superintendent Martin of Kearney Normal. The situation will be felt even more acutely next year.

W. K. Fowler, formerly state superintendent and now associate editor of The Nebraska Teacher. "We lose about 3,500 teachers in the state each year and our new recruits do not equal that number." A. A. Reed, state high school inspector, says we are facing a serious crisis, made acute by the increased attendance in schools.

In the opinion of these, and other educators, the remedy lies partly, but not entirely, in higher salaries. The profession must be made attractive in other ways. Some advocate a 12-month school year. All agreed, however, that higher salaries would help a great deal. "The government is our strongest competitor," declared Superintendent Martin. "A six months' business course fits a girl for a position at $1,000 or $1,200 a year in stenographic or clerical work. To equip herself for a like salary as a teacher, she has to spend two years in a normal school or be at least a high school graduate. Our standards are high, and should be, but the salaries are not commensurate with the requirements and present-day costs."

Stories told by these men illustrated the point that a smart young man or woman can hardly afford to go to school nowadays. One particularly capable manual training student who left school to go to war. When he returned to this country he took a shop position. Learning this, the authorities made an effort to reach him and induce him to return to school. "You are especially apt," said his former instructors, "and if you will return to school we can promise you a remunerative position next year."

"How much do you think I will make?" asked the young man. "About $1,500 a year," came the reply.

"But I am making $2,400 now and all expenses."

Hugh S. Magill, field secretary of the National Education association, said recently:

"We cannot expect to induce the best qualified men and women to enter school teaching unless we pay them, and we cannot expect those well qualified who now are teaching to remain so long as they can make what they are doing elsewhere. In the United States there are 140,000 teachers have quit the profession in the United States. There are 35,000 school rooms in the United States that are without teachers. This condition is not so bad in the north as in the south. Many school districts in the south reported a shortage of 35 per cent of their teachers in September. In the United States 6 per cent of the teaching positions are without teachers."

This is a condition upon which people at large may well reflect. If it is not corrected, only the weak and anemic will be attracted into the teaching profession and the penalty will be imposed upon the children of the future. The final result, educators declare, will be nothing less serious than the crumbling of our civilization.
